thousand times the world in which the spider lives seemed as big as the human world and full of wonder and interest. The mother spider clings to her egg, the professor takes a wisp of straw which, in its magnified shape, looks like a barber pole and vainly tries to rob the mother. Presently the egg opens and myriads, apparently, of little spiders swarm out and a moment later we see the tiny creatures covering the whole screen, giving a tapestry effect which is indescribably beautiful.

"I show you," said Professor Ditmars, "this spider film and other kinematographic work on insects because it was the most difficult. I have made a study of cameras for close studio work. The support of my camera, as you see, is stationary and does not rest on a tripod. In microscopic work my stage is very small; I have a much larger stage for other work. Kinematography is very much like writing, only our work appears in living moving images on the screen, while the old style of composition confines itself necessarily to printed characters. In producing my series of zoological courses it has been my object to make the animals explain themselves on the screen. We ought not to be satisfied with merely showing a specimen of the animal. We must show the habits, the structure, and all the distinguishing characteristics of the creature which is to be shown on the screen and to be understood by the beholders. That is why I have sought to inject an element of humor into these pictures, humor which has its source in the animal itself.

Suiting the action to the word the professor gave a most marvelous demonstration in superclear and sharp photography of the origin of the frog. We saw the spawn shortly after it had been deposited, we followed the separation of the individual particles or eggs until we noticed that the eggs began to move, and we had before us the new born tadpole. In swift stages we are carried to the point where Mr. Frog sits beside the water a perfect specimen of his kind. Now appears a rope stretched across the screen and the frog is trying to hold on to it the best he knows how. He realizes that it is risky to let go and drop and he also realizes that his perch on the rope is anything but comfortable. He looks bewildered and indulges in all kinds of funny acrobatic stunts until he is rescued. The comedy in this picture is irresistible; it will not only throw a room full of children into the wildest laughter, but also will make the sourest hypochondiac relax into nothing less than a hearty laugh.

"It is here," continued Professor Ditmars, "that I made a new discovery," showing as he said so a salamander coiled about his eggs.

"This salamander," the impromptu lecturer went on running easily with the action on the screen, "leaves its eggs on a spot where it knows the water will carry them away. This is the salamander's way of spawning you might say, and it is something entirely new."

Thus amid much other talk, "which my story cares not to rehearse," the afternoon faded into the evening and the evening into the night with the full splendor of the February sky shining down upon us.

It must be said in conclusion that no one is better aware of the importance and withal the value of his work than Professor Ditmars. He knows that he has had the best of the start and is now in the lead by a most substantial margin. I make no excuse for drawing his portrait in large outline for he will loom large in the coming months and years. He has made his friendship for the motion picture and his faith in its educational possibilities count in the most practical way possible. Though the bubbling humor of the man and the evident suggestion of Raymond Hitchcock in his appearance and his manner and his speech might tempt one to believe that he looks at the world in the spirit of the laughing philosopher there is behind all this a vast tenacity of purpose, a comprehensive grasp of facts, an unswerving devotion to useful work and a fund of vitality which will last for a good deal more than a full score of years.

If he lived in England he could not escape a decoration or other royal reward for being the father of kinematographic zoology.

GRIFFITH ON THE JOB.

Miss Blanch Sweet, who has been in quarantine on account of symptoms of scarlet fever which developed while she was working on D. W. Griffith's production of "The Escape" for the Mutual, has been released and is now on her way to join the rest of the company in Los Angeles, Cal. Mr. Griffith preceded her by about a week, making a few stops on the way, one of which was a visit to his mother. By the time this reaches our readers the entire Mutual Company of players and scenario writers will be assembled and hard at work on new productions.

Regarding recent rumors concerning Mr. Griffith, calculated to lead to the impression that he was not satisfied with his present connections, his representative and attorney, A. H. T. Banzhaf, makes the statement that Mr. Griffith has never been more agreeably situated or in better position to realize his great and original ideas and the Mutual is delighted with his initial achievements. Both parties desire to have it known that the present intention as to the connection is for permanency.

MORE NEW YORK THEATERS FOR PICTURES.

The Continental Feature Film Company, which is the feature department of the Mutual Film Corporation, has obtained a lease of Weber's Theater on Broadway near 30th Street, New York, for a period of ten weeks, with option for a renewal, and will take possession at an early date. The same company is said to have acquired the old Metropolitan Skating Rink on Broadway near 52nd Street, and will adapt the building for picture exhibitions.

The Anglo-American Corporation is reported to have leased the New York Theater, Broadway and 45th Street, next door to the Vitagraph Theater, from William Morris, and will open the house with "The Three Musketeers," a big feature picture, about February 23rd. The house will be re-christened the New York Kinema. The Anglo-American Corporation is capitalized at $300,000 and C. M. Robertson, of 111 Broadway, is its president. Edward Laurillard, of London, is also interested.

CINEMA CAMERA CLUB BALL.

The first annual ball of the Cinema Camera Club will be held at Pabst Coliseum, 110th Street, between Lenox and Fifth Avenues, New York City, on the evening of Monday, February 23. The Cinema Camera Club is composed of motion picture camera men.

"Money God."

Five-Part Metropolitan Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS story grips interest from the start by presenting a problem that has never been satisfactorily solved, namely: "Would the sudden acquisition of great wealth make or unmake a man of average intelligence, unaccustomed to handling capital?" The question comes up for discussion at a millionaire's club and two members of the multi-millionaire class undertake to decide it by experiment, in spite of enormous difficulties in the way, not the least of which is uncertainty about the man to be selected for the trial. The one finally chosen is a sea captain unknown to any of the contending parties, who is out of work and has advertised for a position.

A Characterization in "The Money God."

The secret purpose of the plot is to open up wide opportunity for sensational development, and, as might be expected, events follow lines of least resistance, but there is far less falsification of character for the sake of thrilling incident than in most plays of this kind. The time alloted for testing the effect of sudden wealth, two years, and the fortunes risked, make it obvious that realism is not even attempted, the main idea being to give a bright colored exhibit of sensational adventure, yet the types chosen are admirable and the acting of the central character, Captain Palmer, is delightfully consistent. So far as he is concerned, there is an abundance of "action in character" to balance the "character in action" of the average melodrama.

Captain Palmer is lured into relations with a drunken sailor, none other than one of the parties to the wager in disguise, and is given honest labor before he is tempted by the drunken sailor's story of secreted gold. Palmer's cupidity is roused and he steals the gold planted where it was intended he should find it. The story breaks rather abruptly into a changed condition, showing Palmer as a man of wealth already self-opinioned and somewhat demoralized by his sudden accession to a higher position in life. He is not, however, inclined to spend money in riotous living. His cupidity grows in very natural fashion. He becomes a usurer, lends money to fishermen in dull season, and enters upon a line of business well suited to his past experience, that of ship owner.

Minor issue is the love of an honest workman for Palmer's daughter, brought in to emphasize that change of character and point of view which almost invariably results from a sudden rise in fortune. Palmer attempts to wed his daughter to a title and loses her. She runs away with the man she loves and this wedding of hearts is secretly supported by Palmer's wife. When the captain finds that his plans have been thwarted and that the love match is being encouraged by his wife, he turns her from his door and is alone in the world.

He is unaffected, not in the least disconcerted, when a captain of one of his steamers reports that she, "The Victoria," is not in fit condition for an ocean voyage. Palmer goes aboard—so, also, does one of the parties to the wager—discharges the captain and takes command in person. The steamer sets out on her voyage and we are given a remarkable view of men coaling her fires in the boiler room, a realistic picture, the more remarkable that it is a studio setting. It shows the actual workings of that part of an ocean steamer with what gives the impression of careful attention to detail. I have been in all parts of a transatlantic liner, and thought at first it was the real thing.

There a terrible accident occurs, resulting in a leak that cannot be stopped, and a condition of suspense is created when stokers, stripped to the waist, attempt to draw the fires before they and the inrushing flood of water meet in disastrous explosion. This suspense is quickened by the sudden bravery of Captain Palmer. A gradual and consistent conversion occurs, a change of attitude toward his fellow creatures, when he joins his stokers in the desperate fight they are making. The man is manly, true to his calling, when face to face with peril. The Victoria's passengers have now become panic-stricken, and their rushing about is rather meaningless—there was opportunity lost in not showing a struggle to enter the ship's boats—until they are quieted by a wireless from a steamer coming to their rescue.

Captain Palmer fights manfully to save his ship until he is exhausted and meets with serious injury. He is carried to his own cabin and becomes delirious. In his delirium, while he is being held by his men, the events of his past are swiftly reviewed, and he dies in an agony of remorse. The ship's passengers and crew are taken off. The party who wagered on the side of wealth's demoralizing influence returns to his club, and he, too, has learned a terrible lesson, has caught a glimpse of what a power for evil is vast wealth in bad hands.

The theme is a big one and is handled with sincerity, but the treatment is so often dominated by concessions to the sensational that the powerful effect of its solution is not felt as much as it would be if all incidents, however exciting, were made tributary to characterization and the enforcement of the leading idea. That leading idea involves so much relating to the use and abuse of wealth that it belongs less to the material realm of action than to the spiritual one of laying bare man's soul.

PRESIDENT LAEMMLE AT THE COAST.

Head of the Universal Signs Up Well-Known Players and Directors on the Day of His Arrival.

President Carl Laemmle, of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, left New York for Los Angeles on Lincoln's Birthday, February 12. On the morning of the 18th there was received at the offices of his company word of new Universal players and directors—Ford Sterling, the comedian; Henry Pathe Lehrman, author and director; Robert Thornby, director and player, all of whom have been working in Keystone comedies. Fred J. Balshofer resigns from the New York Motion Picture Company forces this week to form a company containing Messrs. Sterling and Lehrman. Mr. Balshofer will release his productions, which will be comedies, through the Universal program.

Mr. Sterling is a well-known comedian with a distinct individuality and one who has literally made millions laugh. Mr. Lehrman has been successful in his work of writing and directing. Mr. Thornby was for a long time with the Vitagraph Company. It was while with this firm that he put on a tramp comedy. The result was a pronounced hit, showing that Mr. Thornby possessed fun-making talent of a high order.

President Laemmle says he is feeling fine. Also he intimates that he will have an additional announcement to make next week.

THEODORE WHARTON OUT OF ESSANAY.

Theodore Wharton, one of the best known directors in the business, arrived in New York, February 18, from Chicago, where he concluded, a few days previously, an engagement of nearly three years' duration with the Essanay Company. While with that organization, Mr. Wharton produced some splendid and successful pictures, notable among which are: "Dear Old Girl," "Sunlight," etc. His latest work of consequence is the "Life of Buffalo Bill," which included Colonel Cody, General Miles and other illustrious survivors of the Indian wars.

Mr. Wharton has burned all his bridges behind him and from this time on will go it alone. He plans to begin at once upon the "Wharton" brand of films with Ithaca, N. Y., or some city in that vicinity, as production headquarters. Incidentally Theodore is the man who put Ithaca on the map as a moving picture paradise, and he stands so strong with the Ithacans that it seems probable that they will never allow Mr. Wharton's company to locate in one of two other localities that are offering inducements.

MAJESTIC THEATER CHANGES HANDS.

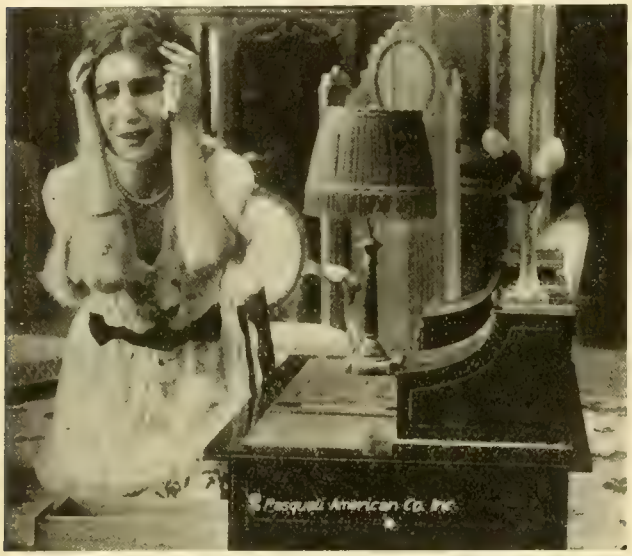
B. I. Miller, of Wilkes Barre, Pa., has purchased from Hunt and Sullivan, the Majestic Theater established by them. Mrs. Miller will be associated with her husband in the management of the theater.

"Under Suspicion"

New Pasquali Picture in Three Parts Makes an Old Theme New by Its Art.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE "intimacy" of a new Pasquali three-reel offering is noteworthy, and it will be the more noticeable because the theme is old. The plot, in its broad outlines, has been used often, and, except for its careful elimination of all save one or two improbable things, and for its fresh "touches" of humanity—which do not change the direction of the story—there is nothing new in it. Yet these touches of freshly imagined humanity are important when the picture is considered as entertainment for the public. It is these things that make it a commendable offering, for they give, as shown in new characters, an interest that is lively and personal. Perhaps the staging and direction, which are both of high order, give the picture this special interest; yet it is a well rounded production, and the script also shows hard work and fresh thought.



Scene from "Under Suspicion.

The three principal characters are a manufacturer, whose home is in the same building with his works; the wife who has married for money and does not love her husband, though she feels a sense of her obligation to him; and, lastly, the trusted secretary of the manufacturer. This young man is an old-time playmate of the wife and is in love with her. The picture's intention is to keep this attachment an honorable one and the two people free from blame, at the same time convincing us that the feeling between them is strong. In a few carefully put-on scenes, the smoothly-running and well-ordered household is placed before us. There is a noticeably pleasing naturalness in the conduct of the action and the trimming of the sets; the gestures, the entrances and exits also delight us with their lifelike appearance. The grace and beauty of the leading woman, her child, who is attractive, and many other things that cannot be separated from the whole help all the time in keeping us wakefully concerned with what is going on before us. It is shown that a fourth character, a clerk, is gambling beyond his means. Then, by two well-written letters—all the picture's subtitles are carefully made and help in its impression—it is also shown that the secretary has decided to leave his employer lest the affection between him and the wife should compromise her. He asks her for a last interview and this she grants. It is at midnight—not strongly probable—and her husband is away. Now, a package containing money was left in the employer's desk at the factory, and the gambling clerk knows of it. He steals it and gets away unobserved, while the secretary, coming from the house, is seen by the watchman, standing before the door of the factory. When the employer returns and the money is not found, suspicion rests on the secretary who has taken a train and is arrested in a distant city. He, seeing how things are turning out, will not clear himself. The thief is conscience-stricken and puts the money back in the desk. The employer finds it and, in his astonishment, takes it in to tell his wife about it. He takes up the telephone to notify the police when it begins to dawn on his consciousness how peculiar it is that the secretary did not make any defense. His eye glances over toward his wife, and he begins to be suspicious of her. All this taking place slowly in his mind is done by the player in a clear and sure way and holds most certainly. It is a very clever piece of work and well worth while. Finally comes the pleasant ending in which figure the pranks of the child who has stolen the note sent by the secretary to the wife, and which the husband and father finds in time. The acting of the player who takes the employer's part is the best thing in the offering, but he is ably supported and everybody in the cast is natural and effective. It is not strong enough to be counted a great impression, but can safely be relied upon to interest; a fair feature offering.

"The Man Who Came Back"

Columbus Five-Part Subject.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THERE is much action in this five-part production of the American Kineto Corporation. There are many interesting scenes that, well photographed, serve to embellish the story. These will, in a large measure, atone for the absence of a dominating character—one around whom the interest automatically centers throughout the production. To be sure, we are concerned as to the welfare of the young man, Roberts, whose father goes to his watery death following business failure owing to the treachery of a banker animated by a stated but unexplained grudge. Roberts drops out of sight entirely for the whole of the second part. As the ship on which he is sailing to South Africa is lost, and as reported with all on board, it is fair to assume he has met death until we recognize him in the group at the Cape. The wife back home reads of the disaster and the shock kills her; the baby is adopted by a neighbor.

Scene from "The Man Who Came Back" (Am. Kineto).

The beginning of the second reel marks the introduction of new characters by reason of a lapse of twenty years. The Roberts infant is now a grown girl, and employed as a dancer. The son of the unscrupulous banker falls in love with the dancer, but owing to the objection by the older Martin the girl decides to refuse a bribe to leave town; she goes anyway. Singularly enough, she sails for the very part of the world where her father is. On the same steamer is a woman, a sort of adventuress, commissioned by Martin to report on the situation at the new gold fields. There are many adventures before Roberts, who for some reason has changed his name to Treberson, now rehabilitated in fortune, goes back to Europe to get his revenge on the man who ruined him. As a matter of fact, he does no such thing, as the requited love of his daughter for the son of the banker intervenes and all ends happily.

There is a wealth of incident which undoubtedly will appeal to those who favor action, but the construction seems machine rather than hand made. It measurably interests at times, but never does it grip hard. There are good situations, as, for instance, when the elder Roberts confronts Martin, the banker, in an effort to prevent ruin; or when the banker tries to bribe the dancing girl to leave the city; or when the returned miner, again wealthy, goes to the home of Martin and demands of the banker that he kill himself with the pistol Roberts furnishes.

There is an ingenious interweaving of unrelated scenes having for an object the creation of atmosphere. One illustration of this is the sight of an ocean liner going down the river; views of the ocean and river in moonlight; or the spectacular dynamiting of a field of prosaic stumps following the announcement that the mine is to be opened by celebrating explosions. The principals of this unusually long cast are competent actors.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

MASSACHUSETTS EXHIBITORS FIGHT LEGISLATION.

Defense Fund Raised and Counsel Engaged—Assistance Received from Manufacturers—Progress Made.

NINETEEN bills affecting the interests of the moving picture exhibitors have been introduced at the present session of the Massachusetts Legislature. The bills vary from the sort introduced by people, well intentioned, but ignorant of the status of the industry, to the variety fathered by those whose motives are open to grave suspicion. This serious state of affairs immediately stirred into action the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts which had been rather inactive of late, and the week just past has been mostly given over to meetings of exhibitors to devise ways and means to combat the attempt at unjust legislation. A great deal of conversation and no little real action was the outcome. The two salient moves made by the League were: First, the collection of nearly $1,500, and, second, the retaining of Judge Brackett to defend and protect the exhibitors' rights "on the hill."

When the situation was fully appreciated the exhibitors were not at all slow to act, and the meetings were by far the most enthusiastic and resultful ever held in this State. The general contribution of photoplay theaters was $25 each. Concerns owning more than one house contributed this amount for each theater. The treasury of the League was also augmented by $100 contributions from the Universal and the Mutual Boston offices, with the Famous Players Company of Boston donating a like amount. Warner's Features and the Nicholas Power Company gave fifty dollars each, while the General Film Company has given the services of Judge Parker, its Boston attorney, in the matter of the "twenty minute law."

A committee of three members of the League was selected to call upon the Operators' Union, Boston Local 182, inasmuch as the latter was favoring a bill that was hostile to the exhibitors' interests. The committee—Rosen, Grant and Drown—conferred with Business Agent Franke, of the Operators' Local, presenting the attitude and intentions of the League. The result of this was that Business Agent Franke addressed the exhibitors at a meeting held at Rathbone Hall, 694 Washington Street, Boston, on February 13, stating officially that the Union would withdraw its objections and would agree and accept the amendment to the twenty minute bill as desired by the exhibitors. The committee to confer with the Operators' Union was instructed to further confer with the latter to ascertain its attitude on other matters affecting the exhibitors. The committee was increased to five members by the addition of Messrs. Eichler and Lourie.

A committee of exhibitors was selected to handle legislative matters and was composed of Horstmann, O'Neill, Campbell, Howard, Lydon and Sprowle. The various interests co-operated splendidly at these meetings against the common foe—unjust legislation—and there is now every good reason to believe that Massachusetts is to have an efficient League. The League has now been incorporated, and each member is to receive a charter of the association, which is to be hung in his theater in a conspicuous place. M. D. Douglas Flattery, Boston representative of the Marcus Loew interests, deserves commendation for his energetic co-operation, and Horstmann, Eslow, Campbell, Howard and others who were working at high pressure to work up enthusiasm. It is believed that now no unjust legislation will be enacted into law, due to the vigilance of Judge Brackett and League members.

To give an example of the kind of bills introduced into the Massachusetts legislature we print the following:

HOUSE, NO. 1638.

SECTION 1. No person shall be admitted to a theater or other place of entertainment when all the seats in such theater or other place are already occupied, and it shall be unlawful to sell, give or exchange any ticket admitting persons to a theater or other place of entertainment in excess of the seating capacity of such theater or other place.

SECTION 2.—Violation of any provision of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten or more than one hundred dollars for each offence.

HOUSE, NO. 1640.

SECTION 1.—No moving picture entertainment shall depict a scene, or scenes of murder, bloodshed or violence.

SENATE, NO. 299.

SECTION 1.—It shall be the duty of the chief of the district police personally, or by some member of the district police acting under his direction, to inspect every moving picture, or the film therefor, before it is exhibited in public in this commonwealth, and to prohibit the production of any immoral or indecent pictures, or any pictures tending to degrade the public. For the purpose of this act said chief may employ three additional inspectors, each of whom shall receive a salary not exceeding.....dollars per annum.

SECTION 2.—It shall be unlawful for any person to exhibit any moving picture which has not been inspected and approved by the district police.

SECTION 3.—Whoever violates any provision of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten dollars nor more than three hundred dollars for each offence.

SENATE, NO. 356.

SECTION 1.—It shall be unlawful for any person to carry on a display of moving pictures or a vaudeville entertainment, so called, except between the hours from one to five in the afternoon and from seven to eleven in the evening.

SECTION 2.—Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten nor more than five hundred dollars for each offence.

W. M. Seligsburg, attorney for the Mutual Film Corporation, was present at the Friday afternoon meeting of the League and addressed the exhibitors. Mr. Seligsburg remarked that he has been fighting censorship of pictures in several states, and that he could not see why Massachusetts exhibitors were willing to have any state or city censorship. Mr. Seligsburg advocated the fighting of censorship in any form by the state or city, but this idea found little or no favor with those present, as it is deemed good judgment to allow the State Police to censor the reels to be used on Sundays (only), as it has been found that this course is the wisest, for it eliminates the antagonism of many of the clergy and others who are satisfied that the photoplays are satisfactory for exhibition generally, provided only that the Sunday pictures be watched over especially.

The bill forbidding children under fifteen years of age to be admitted to photoplay theaters, unless accompanied by an adult, was promptly "killed" on Tuesday, February 11th, which augurs well for the work done by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts.

On Friday, February 13th, the bill relative to Senator Cox's petition to provide a censorship of moving pictures was heard. This hearing was before the committee on Mercantile Affairs, and the room was crowded with friends and opponents of the measure. Winthrop, Mass., turned out en masse to approve the bill, due to the recent experience in that city when the Dream Theater's license was temporarily canceled, due to the exhibition of films objectionable in the eyes of some local "uplift" societies. D. C. Freeman, president of the Winthrop Improvement and Historical Society; Mrs. John Grant, representing the Winthrop Women's Civic League, and many others representing "high-brow" societies appeared in favor of the bill. The bill was opposed by Judge Brackett, who represents the Exhibitors' League as well as the Theater Managers' Association; W. M. Seligsburg, M. Douglas Flattery, W. C. Franke and J. A. Eslow, general manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston. Senator Cox's bill seeks to place the censorship in the hands of the state police. Chief Whitney, of the state police, explained that his duties at present consist of the censoring of pictures shown on Sundays only.

The general contention of the opposition was that the bill as framed will not bring about the censorship that is desired, and that it should not apply to Boston, as this city is well taken care of. It was also contended that there would be a foolish dividing of responsibility, and that there would be a criss-crossing of authority. No action was taken on the bill, but it was interesting to note that some of the civic committees which spoke in favor of the bill did not even know that pictures were censored in New York by the National Board of Censorship.

CINCINNATI LOCAL MEETING.

A meeting of the Cincinnati Exhibitors' Local was held at the Sinton Hotel on Thursday, February 12. Resolutions were passed condemning the "country store" and similar devices. The members of the local testified to their belief of the good work of the organization by increasing the monthly dues from fifty cents to one dollar.

THE SECOND INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Plans For a Big and Instructive Display of Motion Picture Devices at Dayton, Ohio, Next July 6 to 11.

HEADQUARTERS of the Second International Exposition of Motion Picture Art was opened at Dayton, Ohio, on Thursday, February 5th, by Managing Director George H. Wiley, secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and Assistant Director Clem Kerr. A commodious suite of offices in the Commercial Building has been engaged for the campaign, and the scene will be a busy one from now on. The date for the exposition is July 6th to 11th, concurrent with that of the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and it will be held in the beautiful new Memorial Hall, recently completed.

What can be accomplished by expositions devoted to the motion picture trade was demonstrated by the great interest taken in the first international exposition of motion picture art ever held in America, which occurred under the auspices of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at the Grand Central Palace in New York last year. Never before were so many common interests gathered together under one roof, and never before have individual exhibitors been so generally pleased with the results. The only criticism expressed was that there were so many diversions in New York that the exhibitor from out of town, for whose benefit the exposition was really planned, was too greatly distracted, and the fullest results were not attained. This fault cannot be held up against an exposition to be given in a smaller city such as Dayton, where there are few attractions to take the visitor away from the business in hand. For this reason, the Second Annual Exposition should be a greater business success than the one held in New York.

That the attendance of exhibitors will be large there is little question. Dayton is well situated and easy of access. It is in the center of a large and prosperous region, and the exhibitor residing in the middle west will be there in large numbers. Owing to the strictly business character of the exhibits shown at a motion picture exposition, it is the exhibitor who is sought by those making a display. Consequently, the success of the enterprise, from the point of view of the firms who take space at the exposition, will appear more certain than if the event were held in some large center, and the patronage of the general, but non-purchasing public, appealed to.

It is a well-known fact that many firms who had exhibits at the New York Exposition were not entirely satisfied, that they got all the results they might have obtained if the general public had not been admitted to the exposition hall. Many complained that they found it difficult to do business with motion picture theater owners on account of the crowds; also that the picture men took the opportunity of being in New York to see the sights of the city, and did not spend their time examining the exhibits. These two objections cannot be made in the case of an exposition held in Dayton.

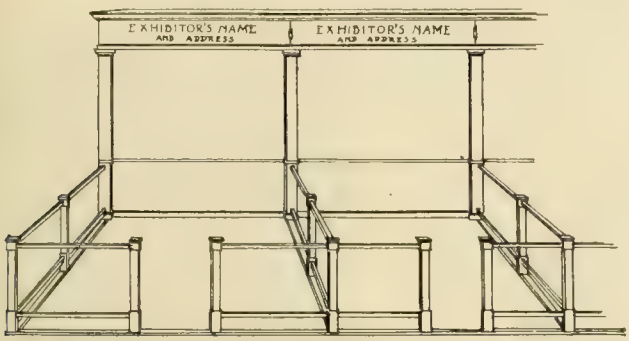
The executive Committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League has canvassed the question thoroughly and believe that they will be able, under the direction of Managing Director Wiley and his assistants, to impress manufacturers of motion pictures and accessories of the truth of these conclusions, and that there will be a strong representation at the Second Annual Exposition.

To this end some impressive literature is being prepared for circulation among the motion picture trade, pointing out the evident advantages of the Dayton Exposition and the reasons for believing that there will be a larger attendance of motion picture theater men at the National Convention in that city than have ever been gathered together before.



Type of Booth for Dayton Exposition.

A diagram of the floor plan of the exposition hall has been prepared and a reproduction is printed herewith, together with a drawing of the proposed style of booth.

According to the rules and regulations adopted by the exposition committee, space will be leased at the rate of $1 and $1.50 per square foot, twenty-five per cent. to be paid upon signing the contract, and the balance on July 1, 1914.

Supporting the efforts of the Executive Committee in making the exposition a success is the Greater Dayton Association, an organization of the business men of that city, which has a membership of 7,500 members. This organization is issuing literature on the subject of the convention and exposition calculated to give material assistance to the managing director. It is proposed by the people of Dayton to make the coming convention and exposition the biggest event ever held in the Middle West.

CLEVELAND LOCAL ELECTION.

At a meeting of the Cleveland Local No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, held February 11, the following officers and directors were elected:

President, C. A. McGown, Cameraphone Theater, 736 Euclid Avenue; Vice-President, G. W. Heinbuch, Superior Theater, 8303 Superior Avenue; Secretary, W. H. Horsey, Carlyon Theater, 124th Street and Superior Avenue; Corresponding Secretary, Louis Becht, Mall Theater, Superior Avenue; Treasurer, F. E. Simmons, Dreamland Theater, 703 Euclid Avenue; Sergeant-at-Arms, J. A. Morris, Orpheum Theater, 8914 Wade Park Avenue; Directors, F. H. Brandt, Leeds Amusement Company, 1445 Leader-News Building; S. Aubley, Corona Theater, 745 Prospect Avenue; Louis Becht, Mall Theater, Superior Avenue; L. P. Stinchcomb, Park National Theater, 1205 Starkweather Avenue; J. A. Morris, Orpheum Theater, 8914 Wade Park Avenue.

NEW YORK EXECUTIVE MEETING.

A meeting of the executive committee of the New York State Exhibitors' Association will be held at the Imperial Hotel on Tuesday, February 24. The meeting will be called to order at 11 o'clock, Tuesday morning. There are many matters affecting the interests of members of the organization to be considered and a full representation is requested.

SAMUEL H. TRIGGER, President.

PITTSBURGH EXHIBITORS AROUSED.

The Pittsburgh Exhibitors' Association, of which James Delves is secretary and treasurer, has appointed a committee of six to act in conjunction with a similar committee appointed by the Motion Picture Protective Association, of Pittsburgh, for the purpose of combatting adverse legislation.

CENSORSHIP PROPOSED IN JERSEY.

Civic and Social Welfare Societies of That State Frame a Bill to Regulate Motion Pictures and Picture Theaters.

A combination of the several civic and social welfare societies of the State of New Jersey, represented in a delegate body known as the Motion Picture Commission of the State of New Jersey, has formulated a measure to be offered at the present session of the State Assembly, now sitting at Trenton, for the purpose of regulating motion pictures and motion picture theaters throughout that State. The text of the proposed measure was agreed upon at a meeting held in Newark, Monday, February 16, and was to have been introduced on the following day.

This measure provides for a strict regulation of all picture theaters in the State and recites the provisions of the health, fire and police regulations applying to regular dramatic theaters, and a state-wide license which will govern all cases not covered by local provisions already in force.

The censorship features of the bill are covered by sections 20, 21 and 22, which read as follows:

SECTION 20.—No films or reels shall be brought into this state for the purpose of being exhibited, nor shall any film or reel, and the motion pictures therein contained, be exhibited in this state, unless it shall have been submitted to the state board of commissioners hereinafter provided for, and by them approved for exhibiting purposes. The state board of commissioners shall from time to time publish and send to every licensed exhibitor and every local licensing body a list of all films and reels approved by them, and no exhibitor shall use or permit to be exhibited any film or reel not appearing in said official list.

SECTION 21.—No advertising posters shall contain anything not appearing in the film advertised.

SECTION 22.—For censoring each film or reel before its exhibition in this state is permitted a fee of one dollar ($1), shall be charged by the state board of commissioners, which fee shall be payable by the person or corporation supplying the film or reel for use in moving picture theaters in this state. The Governor shall appoint a commission of three, one of whom shall be a woman, for terms of one, two and three years, and thereafter annually for a term of three years. The duties of the commission shall be to enforce the provision of this act. Said commissioners shall receive a salary of $2,500 each per year, and shall have power to appoint one or more inspectors or clerks whose total salaries shall not exceed $3,000 per year.

It would not be judicious to criticize this measure in advance of its formal introduction in the New Jersey State Legislature, but its terms as proposed suggest that motion picture interests generally should evince some interest in the proceedings and be prepared to meet any emergency that may arise in the event that such a bill is seriously considered at Trenton.

A CORRECTION.

It was announced in the Moving Picture World of February 14 that the Pennsylvania State Exhibitors' League had elected new officers with Mr. Samuel Wheeler as president. The announcement should have made the fact plain that it was the Philadelphia Local that elected officers and not the State League. In calling the error to our attention President Edward A. Jeffries, of the Pennsylvania State League, writes that the exhibitors of Philadelphia are particularly fortunate in securing Mr. Wheeler for their president, as his manner in dealing with matters that come before the various city departments proves that he is the man who has long been wanted.

KENTUCKY LEAGUE MEETING IN APRIL.

The Kentucky Exhibitors' League will hold a convention at Lexington, Ky., on April 21 and 22, 1914. Headquarters will be at the Phoenix Hotel. J. H. Stamper, Jr., is chairman of the committee of arrangements. The Commercial Club of Lexington is co-operating with Mr. Stamper in arranging for the meeting.

BROOKLYN EXHIBITORS TO GIVE BALL.

Motion picture theater men of Brooklyn, N. Y., are arranging for a ball to be held on Monday evening, March 16, at Prospect Hall, Fifth Avenue and Prospect Place, Brooklyn. It is announced that Earle Williams, of the Vitagraph Company, and Leah Baird, of the Universal, will lead the grand march. Other leading photoplayers will be present. William Hollender is chairman of the committee of arrangements.

PRESIDENT NEFF IS BUSY.

Reports from the headquarters of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at Cincinnati are to the effect that President Neff is on a tour through the South. He will visit exhibitors in Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, Florida, North and South Carolina and Virginia. Representatives of the league are working in Indiana, and a convention will soon be called in that State to elect delegates to the Dayton convention. West Virginia is expected to call its annual convention soon.

Two Comprehensive Apexes

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE right bower in the Apex hand just now is, perhaps, its four-reel melodrama of English army life in India, called "Brother Officers." It is a story of love between a young lieutenant and his colonel's daughter and rises to a heroic climax in an exciting fourth reel filled with battle smoke, with a brave girl's defense of a plantation from wild hill-men and the dashing rescue by her lover who has been sent out with orders to die. He was under the accusation of cheating, a blot he had courageously assumed, though innocent, to clear another lieutenant, weakling brother of the girl and son of the colonel. It is the colonel who gives him this chance to let the enemy kill him so as to save the regiment from the disgrace of having a "cheat" among its gentlemen officers.

Hardly needs it to be said that the ending is pleasant. The weakling boy is wounded and confesses, so the lieutenant, bright with his fresh laurels, is rehabilitated and taken into the arms of the girl who, knowing all, is able to love him with four times ardent devotion. This kind of picture is going rather strong just now and it can be counted a pretty safe guess by the exhibitor. It is not perfectly written and has one or two scenes carelessly left improbable, we are sorry to say, which a little thought would have made quite convincing.

The quality of its last two reels and especially of its exciting climax saves it as an offering. It was made by the Mrs. Harry Hardgreaves Company with a cast of a hundred players. The principals are pleasing and the lesser figures are unusually convincing, even the hill-men looking like the real thing, as perhaps they are. The photography lacks the art of seeming lifelike, but is clear.

"The Great Bullion Robbery."

"The Great Bullion Robbery," in three reels, has no heroine. We commend it for this; the heroine is too often just "dragged in" in these pictures of robbery and chase. They are certainly not necessary to them. The action in this offering runs clearly and smoothly without appreciable dragging. It has the novelty to American audiences of having typical English backgrounds and the freshness that comes from the slightly different way of doing things in that country as contrasted with both American ways and those of French and Italian officials as shown in pictures.

Scene from "The Great Bullion Robbery" (Apex).

We see as the picture opens the chief of the Tiger gang of robbers go down into the interesting rendezvous of his gang and tell of the great shipment of bullion that the neighboring bank has received. The gang looks over the ground, rents the store next door and mines through the steel vault to where the bars of gold and silver are stored. These are taken out, boxed and carried on a wagon towards the hiding place. One box falls out and the riches are spilled in the road. The gang tries to commandeer a passing motor car of which the chauffeur is a detective who, though left unconscious by the way-side, comes to and notifies the police. There's a chase on horses with a running pistol fight. At a railroad crossing the gang, helped by a train, frees itself from all save the detective who, it so happens, is in the lead. A captive is made of him in a conventional way and he is taken to the hiding place, an interesting old warehouse by a river. The gang proceeds to stow away the bullion. The detective watches his chance and jumps into the water. He is fired upon. Nearby police hear the shots and come to reconnoiter. There's a very smart scrap, well handled and exciting before the thieves are subdued.

Ralph Ince as Lincoln

ONE of the most charming and impressive impersonations that have been seen by any Broadway audience in many a year was given at the Vitagraph Theater, Broadway and 44th Street, on Lincoln's Birthday. For several years, Ralph Ince, now a successful director of the Vitagraph studios, has made a study of the traits and manners of Abraham Lincoln. Time and again motion pictures have been made by the Vitagraph in which Mr. Ince played the part of the country's great president in various episodes in which he was supposed to figure in real life. These characterizations have been remarkably true to the popular conception of Lincoln and have won praise from men still living who knew Mr. Lincoln during his lifetime.

Ralph Ince as Abraham Lincoln.

It was quite fitting, then, that the Vitagraph Company should choose Mr. Ince's impersonation as an added attraction at its theater on Lincoln's Birthday. It occurred on the program just following a pathetic reference to the martyred president in a picture adapted from Ida Tarbell's short story "He Knew Lincoln." The large and appreciative audience had barely time to dry its eyes when the curtain raised upon an artist's studio. The artist, working upon a picture of Lincoln, failing to catch the spirit of the Great Liberator, falls asleep in his chair and dreams.

The substance of this dream is shown when the curtain of his studio window is drawn and there was seen standing in strong silhouette against a distant view of the White House dome the bowed figure of Lincoln. As the lights came up the figure turned and faced the audience and delivered the famous Gettysburg Address. The audience was visibly impressed; the dropping of a pin might have been audible. After delivering the address, which was spoken with great feeling, the form turned, the lights dimmed and the curtain was closed over that pathetic stooping figure.

SWETT RECOVERING FROM OPERATION.

F. W. Swett, the well-known road agent of the Nicholas Power Company, is now slowly recovering from a very serious operation which he underwent about five weeks ago in the New England Baptist Hospital, at Roxbury, Mass. We expect and hope that Swett will again shortly be able to get around again and once more meet his many friends in the business. Herbert Griffin relieved Mr. Swett of his duties at the time he underwent the operation, and left Boston to represent the company at the Cincinnati convention.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. GETS NEW PICTURE THEATER.

The Suellenburg Amusement Co., Atlantic City, N. J., has opened the Virginia Theater, a moving picture theater, in that city. It is one of the finest and largest picture theaters in Atlantic City, and has a seating capacity of 1400. A Wurlitzer organ dispenses the music. The Virginia was opened on February 14, and George Kleine's "Antony and Cleopatra" was the picture shown. It was booked for a week.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

HERE is a picture that will interest theatergoers as it will also screen followers. In the group are Daniel Frohman, managing director of the Famous Players, whose name for many years has been familiar to those interested in stage productions; Madame Kalich, the distinguished actress, and her daughter, Lillian. The photograph was taken on a steamer bound for Cuba, where the Famous Players were to take the exterior scenes for three screen dramas. Madame Kalich has been portraying Marta in "Marta of the Lowlands." Those who have seen her in her work declare the result will be unusual even for the company that has been the medium of introducing so many stage favorites to the screen. The writer was privileged one day several weeks ago to see Madame Kalich working before the camera for perhaps sixty seconds. Just on that glimpse he believes that the prophecy as to the quality of the whole production will come true. The actress has a marvelous face for screen portrayal. It reveals great strength of character and keen intelligence. When the artist was asked if in working before the camera she experienced emotions different from those noted when facing an audience she hesitated. "Just a moment," she replied, in a puzzled manner. "That is a new thought. I'll tell you," she added, with a mischievous flash of the eye, "when I am working in a scene I am wondering if I am facing the camera at the angle most advantageous to myself—my eyes, my mouth, my nose. But seriously, it is all wonderfully interesting." Madame Kalich returned from Cuba last week with her daughter, who, by the way, also was a member of the cast of "Marta of the Lowlands."

Some of the party in Cuba aside from those already named were J. Searle Dawley, the producer; House Peters, who played Basil in "The Pride of Jennico"; Hal Clarendon, Peter Lang, Miss Laura Sawyer, Wellington Playter, and Miss Marie Leonhard. J. Parker Reade, who has made pictures in Cuba and who is a fluent speaker of Spanish, with Mrs. Reade, accompanied the players.

A party of actors were discussing the rule in vogue in some studios debarring the players from seeing on the studio screen productions in which they had worked. One of the group had referred to the practice of one company by which he had been employed of bringing into the projection room all the members of the company and giving them a chance to watch the running of the negative. "Sometimes it is the last extra about the place who discovers something that has escaped the attention of the director and all the players," he said. "His keen observation enables the correction of something wrong that might have got away and on the market. I believe it to be to the advantage of the company as well as for the benefit of the player to let the men and women who have appeared in a picture get a glimpse of their work as soon as possible. It keeps them right up to their work—it gives every player a chance to dissect his own style; and you may be sure there is nobody watches the behavior of a man quite so sharply as the player himself."

"I can vouch for that last statement," said another member of the group. "Last summer I was one of a troupe that put in many months in the mountains. The pictures were taken and the film shipped to the factory. We did not see our work on the screen until away into the fall, and what most of us said about our own work when we eventually did see it on the screen—after the picture was released, if you please—was hardly proper to print. Some of us had acquired abominable mannerisms, which you may wager would have been suddenly terminated had we been given an opportunity to see ourselves as others see us. I'm strong for getting a squint at myself as soon as possible after the work is done."

The municipal authorities of Los Angeles have not been just nice in their treatment of Sheriff Mackley. With great deliberation they carved six feet from his front lawn. A recent letter from the coast reflects the peevish attitude of the sheriff. He says he did the only thing a man of self-respect could do. He moved.

Word comes from St. Augustine about a chap remarking to Arthur Hotaling, the Lubin director, that Richard Ridgely, of the Edison Company, was developing a case of nerves. Hotaling happened to know all about it. The Edison Company had a big production under way and the director had 300 people under contract. Before the job was finished the rain fell—and kept on falling. In fact, it did nothing else—and in sheets—for four days. Which, of course, is just a sample of the little things that go to upset the disposition of an otherwise even-tempered director.

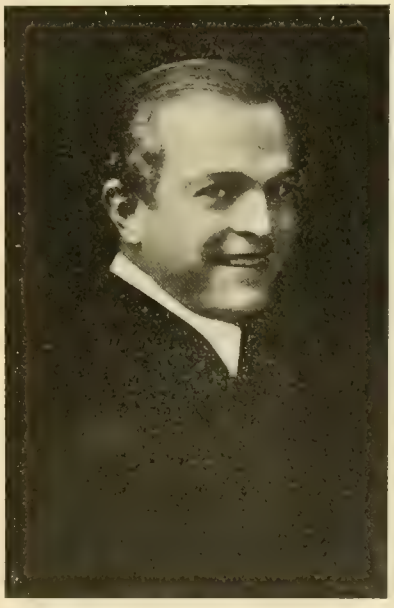
Here's a picture of Billy Quirk, who once was known as "the boy comedian." We don't hear the phrase these days; and yet he seems as much of a boy as he used to be, and surely he is still a comedian—and better than ever. Billy—somehow if you know him you just can't call him anything else, even in print—is now down at the Vitagraph studio, where he is at work once again in comedies, which is the division in acting in which he is best known to screen followers.



Billy Quirk.

Billy was born in Jersey City. He admits that he might have followed a peaceful, uneventful career had he been raised in that municipality, but it was not to be. At the age of three years his parents removed to Matteawan, N. Y., adjacent to a well-known institution for the restraint of citizens inclined at times to cut up generally and people particularly. The future comedian being a keen observer, it was the perfectly natural thing that he should follow with great interest and imitate the antics of the inmates; he admits he has been a "cut up" ever since. At the solicitation of his father, Billy began studying for a veterinary surgeon's diploma, but, as he says, "the horse kicked," and he decided that he would much rather be a live comico than a dead medico.

"I took to the road," said the comedian the other day, "and had my ups and downs, principally downs for a while, but eventually was successful. Once David Belasco told me never to worry about anything and never to 'overact,' but to be natural; I have been trying ever since to follow his advice. I started in picture work some six years ago with the Biograph Company. I like the screen because it dispenses with the unceasing travel and I can have a home and enjoy it. Again, it gives me some time to devote to my pet hobby, breeding and raising French bulldogs. I have twenty of these animals, and among them are some of the best specimens in America. What kind of pictures do I like? Why, for myself I prefer comedies of the nice, clean-cut order. What pictures in which I have appeared do I like best? Personally, I consider Biograph's 'Sweet and Twenty' one of the best comedies ever produced. I also rather liked the Muggsy Series, in which I played the original Muggsy. But why talk about the past? I am looking forward to the future."

Billy is one of the charter members of the Screen Club. At the election last fall he was chosen a member of the Board of Governors, which indicates with sufficient clearness the regard in which he is held by his fellow-players.

Favors Increase in Admission Price

The Universal to Give Its Exhibitors First Showing of "Samson," but the Public Must Pay.

THE board of directors of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company have decided, in the case of their forthcoming six-reel subject of "Samson," to alter the customary procedure of showing their feature pictures to the public. The officers of the company are aware of the complaints that have been made by many exhibitors that the larger theaters have taken the cream from the big productions, and that by the time these subjects are assigned to the smaller exhibitors their value has been materially diminished. The company will give its exhibitors an opportunity of trying out the experiment of showing in the regular picture houses "Samson" at an advanced price—say 25 cents as a minimum basis.

"Many exhibitors have said that they could make a legitimate theater out of their picture house if they had a subject that was big enough and they were given the opportunity," said one of the officers of the company on Wednesday. "Now here is 'Samson,' in the making of which we have spent many thousands of dollars and which will be six reels in length, which we believe an eminently fit subject for determining if our exhibitors are willing to back us up in our efforts to give their patrons really big stuff. We are determined to see if the continental idea of charging big prices can be worked out in this country. Just think of the greater earning capacity of the men and women here as compared with those of Great Britain and Europe. Also look at the small sum paid by the public here to see pictures—just the same pictures, understand; three-quarters of the films shown on the other side are produced in this country. Why, in London 2s. 6d. will be paid without hesitation, in Paris as high as 80 cents, in Berlin 50 cents, and in Vienna 40 or 60 cents. Now these are the ordinarily fair prices. And in regard to the seats the situation over there is just the reverse. On the basis that the screen cannot be seen to such good advantage from the front the seats in that part of the house are the cheapest. The loges and boxes are at the back of the pit. If the people over there, working as they are for far less money, can afford to pay the prices quoted, certainly we can afford to pay these sums in this country. Why, in London the cheapest admission you can discover to any house is sixpence, or 12 cents.

"We would like to see it come about eventually that all houses would raise the price of admission. This would give exchanges a chance to charge more money for service and the manufacturers some return for their efforts to improve the quality of their product. The cost of making pictures in this country is greater than every before. It is greater in every department, and especially in the money we have to pay these days to producers and actors. We want, as I have pointed out, to provide an opportunity for every Universal exhibitor to demonstrate to himself whether his house is strong enough to hold the patronage which he claims is going over to legitimate houses. Considering the fact that some manufacturers are booking up with legitimate houses, it seems to me it behooves the exhibitors to wake up."

In accordance with the plan as herein outlined Joe Brandt will within a few days inaugurate a national advertising campaign, with "Samson" in the center of the spotlight. Mr. Brandt will employ not only trade agencies, but will make use of the large newspapers of the country. "Samson" will not be released for a couple of months yet.

"RENFAX" ACQUIRING POPULARITY.

The "Renfax" proposition, which is a sort of motion picture illustrated song service, now being promoted by the Renfax Company, World's Tower Building, West 40th Street, New York, is reported to be gaining in popularity at a very satisfactory rate. Something more than fifteen houses in New York City are now using the "Renfax" service regularly and orders are coming in at the rate of two each day. A recent demonstration at the Alhambra Theater, New York, brought offers from several of the large vaudeville circuits, but the managers of the company do not think that they will accept, as it is their desire to keep the service strictly among picture theaters.

Subjects are being made at the rate of six per week, comedy in character, and four releases are now being made weekly. A demonstration will be given in the house of any prospective client without cost. It is the plan of the Renfax Company to give exclusive territory to its subscribers, so that in small towns there will be but one in a town. In large cities the services will be placed as far apart as possible, so that there will be no conflict.

Ample capital is back of the Renfax Company, so that it will be able to carry the proposition to success.

ANOTHER FILM COMPANY.

The Metropolitan Film Co., Inc., which has opened offices on the sixth floor of the World's Tower Bldg., was organized by Hans Bartsch, who is president of the concern. The company will import and manufacture feature subjects in multiple reels.

Mr. Bartsch has been prominently identified with the amusement business for many years, representing the foremost European play publishers, authors and composers, having been connected with such successes as "The Concert," "The Chocolate Soldier," "Madame X," "The Doll Girl," "Madame Sherry," "Is Matrimony a Failure?" and others.

The first release of the new company is "The Money God," in five reels, on which state rights will be sold. H. J. Streyckmans is the sales manager.

SHERRY FEATURE FILM CO., INC., IN NEW QUARTERS.

In order to have all its departments under one roof, the Wm. L. Sherry Feature Film Co., Inc., of New York City, has moved its executive office from the Times Building, to the ninth floor of the Leavitt Building, at 126 West 46th Street, where the film and the advertising departments have been since last October. The Sherry Company controls the productions of the Famous Players Film Co. and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co. for the state and city of New York.

Incidentally it may be stated that all the theaters in the Marcus Loew circuit in the boroughs of New York City have contracted for the Famous Players productions.

BAMBERGER OUT OF PEERLESS.

Leon J. Bamberger has resigned from the position as manager of the Peerless Film & Supply Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., and has disposed of his stock in that concern, of which he was one of the founders and has been connected since its inception last August. Mr. Bamberger is open for propositions and can be reached at his home address, 2442 North Pennsylvania Street, Indianapolis. He has been in the film business for the last five years and in that time has become an efficient executive in the handling of both features and the regular program. He prefers to locate in the central west, or the east, with some reliable distributing company, or is not averse to taking publicity and sales department for a manufacturer.

FOUR FIRST-RUN KLEINE REELS A WEEK.

Through his eighteen branch offices, George Kleine is now offering a program of four first-run reels a week. These programs are proving very popular all over the country, owing to the number of short subjects that are used to make up the four reels. Returns from a circular letter sent to all licensed and independent theaters showed a remarkable dearth of five hundred foot comedies and educational subjects. It also indicated a strong desire on the part of the exhibitors for one thousand foot dramas. The new "George Kleine Attraction" service is exclusive and is offered to only one theater in a town. The service includes the entire line of Kleine subjects such as "Quo Vadis?", "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Antony and Cleopatra," "Between Savage and Tiger," and "Napoleon."

NOTICE OF REMOVAL.

The Special Event Film Manufacturing Company, after the 20th of this month, will be located at 216 West 42nd Street, New York. The floor space is nearly five times the size of the present location on 35th Street and will have excellent facilities for keeping a large amount of stock on hand, such as cameras, tripods, tilts, and motion picture apparatus and supplies of all kinds.

INFORMATION FOR N. Y. AND N. J. EXHIBITORS.

Contrary to the announcement in our last issue regarding the disposal of the state rights for the Apex four-part feature "Through the Clouds," the High Grade Feature Film Co., of 220 West 42nd Street, New York, holds the exhibition rights for this picture for New York State entire, and Northern New Jersey.

SPECIAL EXHIBITION OF LUBIN FEATURE.

The management of the Special Feature Department of the General Film Company announces that an exhibition of the Lubin five part feature "Through Fire to Fortune, or the Sunken Village," will be held at the American Theater, 42d Street and Eight Avenue, at 10 o'clock Wednesday morning, February 25. Members of the press and exhibitors are cordially invited to be present.

"CONVICT NO. 113" (Itala).

This is a story in which a chance impersonation leads to some pathetic complications. Sentenced to penal servitude for life for defrauding his creditors, Revillat saves the life of the governor of the prison. In gratitude at being rescued from the flames, the governor, who subsequently dies from his injuries, persuades the convict to take his place. This he does so successfully by the aid of disguises, that he prospers, pays off his old debts, and finally, still in disguise returns to his wife and daughter. The latter, by the lapse of years, has grown into a beautiful girl and has a lover. A poignant situation arises when the disguised father embraces his own daughter and is suspected by the latter's lover of being a rival. Finally, rather than spoil the happiness of his wife and daughter, the ex-convict returns to his prison governorship.

The acting and photography of this picture are up to Itala standard. A realistic fire scene adds excitement to the offering and there are some striking prison scenes.

ANIMATED WEEKLY'S NEW COAST SERVICE.

A system of "lightning service" in obtaining first-hand material for the Animated Weekly of the Universal has been inaugurated at the Pacific Coast studios of that company. All noteworthy happenings within a radius of 300 miles of Los Angeles will be reported by special wire to the studios without any delay.

This was made possible through the co-operation of Chief of Police Sebastian and Fire Chief Ely of Los Angeles. Special telephone and telegraph wires have been installed so that in case of fire or any matter in which the police are concerned the studios will be notified immediately. At the service of an expert cameraman is a sixty horsepower automobile which is maintained for this service alone. The roads in Southern California are especially adapted to speedy traveling, and the area which the new system covers is one of the most thickly populated in the United States.

SONGS OF ALL NATIONS BY RISING.

Will S. Rising, dean of the picture players, announces that he is about to launch a novel style of entertainment in the form of "Songs of All Nations." Mr. Rising is an old musical comedy favorite and has a good knowledge of the subject he proposes to undertake. It is his purpose to introduce many members of the Screen Club and of the various stock companies in studios where he will produce his scenes, he says.

"THE SINGLE STANDARD" (Griffith Brand).

"Griffith Film" is the name under which the special multiple reel features staged by D. W. Griffith will be presented to the public. Ever since the noted director severed his connection with the Biograph Company and joined the Mutual forces he has been working on the first big features to be released on the Mutual program under the "Griffith Film" brand and, as they will be the first pictures in his long career as a successful photoplay producer to appear under his name, he has spared no effort to make them the greatest photodramas he has ever created.

The appearance of the first "Griffith Film," which will be presented under the title "The Single Standard," is awaited with considerable interest not only by the theater managers, but also by rival photoplay producers, as the great director has introduced so many important innovations in the past that the first big feature launched by him under his own name is sure to contain something that will have an important bearing upon future motion picture productions.

Scene from "The Single Standard" (Griffith).

"The Single Standard," which is in five parts, is a most unusual drama dealing with the powerful subject of a single moral standard for men and women. Besides containing a learned treatment of a great sociological question, it presents a story which for strength of plot and sustained interest could easily have furnished seven or eight reels of valuable film.

Told in five parts as staged by Director Griffith, with the big moment taking place in a magnificent reproduction of a popular New York Tango Roof Garden, the story is intensely dramatic and full of action from "title" to "trailer."

NEW COMPANY IN THE FIELD.

The Industries Motion Picture Company, under the executive directorship of Mr. H. B. Muller, formerly with Warner's Features, Inc., has opened its general offices in the Longacre Building, this city. Mr. Muller expresses himself as being highly satisfied with the results of his missionary work in the industrial field and states that his firm has already two large contracts with international firms under consideration and that the outlook for the future is promising of financial success.

The production of industrial and educational pictures will be the company's specialty and regards the latter, Mr. Muller has secured the assistance of Mr. Henry Ginsberg, who has done considerable government camera work. Mr. Ginsberg was the only man privileged to expose a camera at the G. A. R. encampment in Gettysburg last year, and it is only recently that he filmed the inauguration ceremonies of Gov. Fielder of New Jersey.

"THE TWO ROSES" (Lubin).

A very intense and dramatic story, the subject being the sad effects of incompatibility of temperament. Ernest Haven and his wife Edith were a worthy couple, but Ernest was a red blooded passionate man while his wife was cold and aristocratic, a type of the white rose. A woman of the red rose type comes into the life of Ernest and the fury of selfishness and infidelity take possession of his soul. The Vampire triumphs and purity is crushed. The white rose withers while the red rose blooms with all its insolent beauty. Years of unhappiness pass before the wrong is righted and the recreant husband crawling back for forgiveness is restored to his lovely wife and boy. The wages of sin is death and the vampire gets her due. The cast of the play is an excellent one including Ormi Hawley, Ada Charles, Edward J. Peil, and others. The picture is one of the best the Lubin studio has ever released.

KALEM'S IRISH SOIL ARRIVES.

The soil which Kalem imported from Ireland arrived on the White Star liner "Megantic" recently. The photographs herewith show the sacks containing the Irish soil, being taken from the hold of the "Megantic," and placed on the deck.

As mentioned in the last week's issue of the "World," this soil was dug from the base of the Colleen Bawn Rock, in one of the Lakes of Killarney. It will be distributed, free of charge, among the enterprising exhibitors who feature Kalem's superb three-part adaptation of Dion Boucicault's greatest of all Irish dramas "The Colleen Bawn," which is to be released Monday, March 16th. Exhibitors should make immediate arrangements for the drama and the soil with their exchanges.

"THE CRUCIBLE" (American).

A symbolic title to a most entertaining one reel production pictorially presenting the rise of a young Irish emigrant.

His arrival in the country of hope and promise is followed by his engagement as a laborer. He becomes a member of a local political club. After years of hard work and study, during which he improves every opportunity to advance, he enters politics as a candidate for alderman. Elected to office he bends every effort to retain a clean record for honesty and ability, which results in his becoming candidate for mayor.

Scene from "The Crucible" (American).

The fight is spirited but he wins the election by a good majority. Love interest is interwoven and embellishes the production in a very interesting manner. Altogether the production is meritorious and should prove of great interest. The quality is of the usual "Flying A" type.

Sydney Ayres plays the lead and is ably supported by Vivian Rich and Jack Richardson. Release has been set for March 2nd.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE IN PHILADELPHIA.

The Nova Films Company, of Rome, Italy, is opening an exchange with headquarters in Philadelphia, Pa. From time to time a service will be established in each State until the entire country is covered, including Canada. Some negatives will be sold outright, some few State rights will be sold. On or about March 10th to 15th they will release a picture called the "Nephew's Crime," something out of the ordinary—three reels—three thousand feet—three hundred scenes. Permanent headquarters will be in Philadelphia, Pa.; temporary address, Box 85, Philadelphia, Pa.

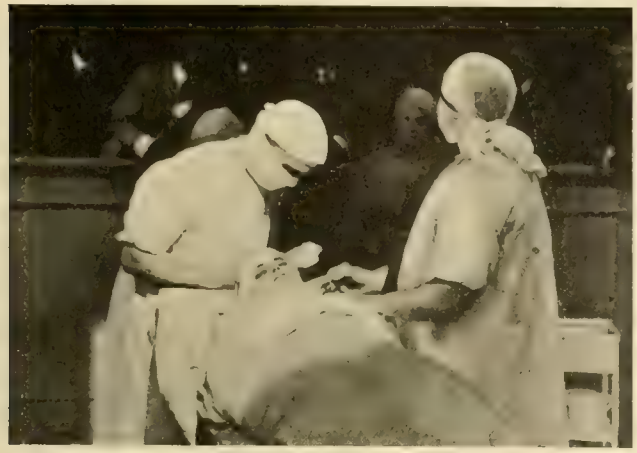
"BY RADIUM'S RAYS" (Gold Seal).

Lately, the newspapers throughout the country have been full of news respecting the rare substance, Radium, and the many uses it can be put to in a curable way. These discoveries have stimulated wide discussion by prominent people until we have come to that stage where one might say that the country is "radium mad."



Scene from "By Radium's Rays" (Gold Seal).

With a view to giving their patrons a wide awake discussion on the topic without the necessity of digging through dry facts, the Universal have provided a play that is at once striking and original. Insanity is the problem that is brought up in this play in connection with radium.

"ON THE FIRING LINE IN TRIPOLI" (Mundstuk).

This latest release of the Mundstuk Feature Company deals with a romantic tale of war, the war in question being the struggle between Italy and Turkey for the possession of some part of Africa. The plot is easy to follow; it treats of the love affair between the wife of a high officer in the Italian army and an inferior officer in the same service. The latter, a young captain, resists the advances of the wife of his brother officer, and when the pursuit of the Potiphar grows too hot, he decides that discretion is the better part of valor, especially in dealing with superamorous ladies, and he promptly rushes off to the front, where he performs marvels of bravery and patriotism. This, of course, gives the producer an excellent chance to introduce war scenes, and one sees some mighty realistic and thrilling episodes which are said to be actual incidents in the late struggle between the Italian and his old time foe the Saracen. There are all the pomp and circumstance of war and there are all kinds of moving accidents by flood and field, etc., etc. The young officer is singled out for dangerous ventures, and so distinguishes himself for his fearlessness that he is decorated right on the battle field and promoted to a high rank. The war ends, and filled with happiness the brave patriot returns only to find that the wife of the superior officer is still after him. His heart has been pledged to a sweet young lady, the stepdaughter of the older and fiercer dame, and he tries hard to pry loose from the more mature beauty. It is vain. She overcomes his scruples, and he gets himself into a most compromising, or at least embarrassing, position when the real sweetheart appears on the scene, and by lying loyally and fancifully for her fiance gets both him and her termagant of a stepmother out of the difficulty. The story ends in the happiest way possible, everybody who has been nice and virtuous is allowed to marry, while the wicked lady of ripened years has no choice left but to return to the allegiance of her aged spouse.

BALBOA FILM CO. SCENARIO CONTEST.

That newspaperdom at large is interested in the field of the motion pictures is shown by the fact that the announcement made recently in the trade papers of the offer of two hundred dollars for the scenario of a three or four reel photoplay by the Balboa Amusement Producing Co., of Los Angeles, California, manufacturers of "Balboa Feature Films," has been copied into more than four hundred daily newspapers published in the United States and Canada. The offer of the Balboa Company holds good until May 1st, and authors also have the chance of having their scenarios purchased immediately at the market price, in addition to the opportunity of participating in the contest.

PAN-AMERICAN ANNOUNCEMENT.

Since the change in the company personel, increase of capital stock, and establishing of branch offices throughout the country, the Pan-American Film Company has undertaken new and far-reaching activities in the exploiting of special feature pictures. The policy of this company henceforth will be to eliminate, as far as possible, all middlemen, brokers and commission agents. The Pan-American will deal with exhibitors direct in all parts of the country. "Fifty Features" will be its advertising slogan, and each feature will be carefully selected.

The Punchfilm Company, Inc., which will release an average of thirty pictures per season, has entered into an exclusive contract with the Pan-American for the exploitation of its pictures.

Contracts have been entered into with the World Wide Film Company; the Great West Motion Picture Company; the Punchfilm Company, Inc.; the Tropical Motion Picture Company, and Around the World Feature Films, for their exclusive output, which will include special features of three reels and upwards in length.

Additional floor space in New York and numerous branch offices throughout the country are ready with an organization equipped to place these features in all parts of the country.

"LUNA-LITE."

The interest displayed by those in attendance at the convention of the Ohio branch of the M. P. E. L. of A., at Cincinnati, the last week in January—in the product "Luna-Lite" which is used for a screen and for other motion picture theater accessories, was more than considerable.

While as a screen it does not produce a bright and vivid picture—it is said to show up a soft and pleasing one, and is, perhaps, worth looking into. At any rate, it is certainly something entirely new in this field and as such we deem it our duty to call the attention of our readers.

"Luna-Lite," as it is called (meaning Moon-Light), becomes instantly luminescent when exposed to the light rays and remains so for a considerable time. In that respect it is clearly a novelty, at least, and an interesting study. Exit doors may be covered with this material and, should all artificial lights be cut off it will, so it is claimed, shine out in the dark. We shall be glad to tell our readers more about this product after we have more carefully inquired into it.

A BRITISH ADVERTISING SUGGESTION.

J. Frank Brockliss, the energetic and resourceful European representative of the Lubin films, misses very few opportunities of getting the well known bell trademark before the public. At a largely attended fancy dress ball in Covent Garden, London, recently, Mr. Brockliss was present in the guise of a London coster, his advertising manager, Mr. Porter, represented Don Quixote, and Miss Maisie Scott, of a London opera company, was dressed in a Lubin bell costume. A number of the English illustrated papers devoted space to a reproduction of the accompanying picture.

Notes of the Trade

EDDIE KULL, the old reliable camera man, who has achieved his entiré scientific education in the Selig establishment, and who is considered one of the most expert men of his class in the country, has been invited to accompany Harry Lauder, en tour, West. He will be with the company four weeks, and started last Saturday. He will stop at the California studio, in Los Angeles, for an indefinite stay.

Mr. Robin, sales manager of Precision Machine Co., reports on his return from the Cincinnati convention, definite sales and favorable outlook. Among special sales was a Simplex projector installed in the Ohio State Penitentiary, Columbus, O., by the American Slide Co. of Columbus.

"The Pursuer Pursued" is a Western photoplay replete with thrills by the American. The dramatic merit of this subject has been brought out as only the American Company can bring it out. Ed. Coxen, George Field and Winifred Greenwood play the leading roles. Release March 5th.

"Trapped in the Great Metropolis," the first release of the Rolands Feature Film Co., is notable for its sensational realism. Exciting incidents follow one another in rapid succession, and interest is maintained to the very end. George K. Rolands, the producer of many of the best selling specials of the last few years, including "The Lure of New York," has surpassed all his former efforts in this powerful feature.

Elsie Janis, with Montgomery and Stone and the entire "Lady of the Slipper" company, during their engagement in Pittsburgh, were guests at a special photoplay performance, given at The Arcade Motion Picture Palace, by Mr. Robert Emmett Cleary, manager and friend of Miss Janis, and Mr. Walter Kinson, manager of The Fourth Avenue General Film Company, Pittsburgh, Pa. The guests arrived at 11:45 P. M. and enjoyed photoplays until 2:30 A. M.

Maurice Lobel, the well-known traveling representative, formerly with the Warner's Features, has been engaged in a like capacity with the World Film Corporation, and starts renewing old acquaintances as representative of that company forthwith.

In "The Child of the Desert," by the Flying A Co., the plains are utilized to good advantage. The story retains the interest throughout and exemplifies perfect dramatization as well as photographic quality. Release March 7th.

"Goodness Gracious"; or "'Movies' as They Shouldn't Be" is a screamingly funny burlesque on motion pictures. The very absurdity of the story, situations, acting and characters makes all the fun. Sidney Drew, Clara Kimball Young, Ned Finley, James Lackaye, Etienne Girardot and other pictorial artists, members of the Vitagraph Company, portray the many parts.

The Wm. L. Sherry Feature Film Company announces that the entire Marcus Loew circuit of theaters of the metropolitan district had contracted for a feature service, comprising the entire output of the the Sherry Co. The contract also includes the Jesse Lasky production with Dustin Farnum in "The Squaw Man."

The World Films Corporation, in Philadelphia, last week, seized a pirated copy of their sensational film, "Protea." They have also discovered the existence of another duped copy and are hot on its trail. They intend protecting their patrons and are going to fight all pirates to a finish. The case in Philadelphia comes to trial this week.

E. D. Horkheimer, secretary and treasurer of the Balboa Amusement Producing Co., manufacturers of "Balboa Feature Films," has returned to Los Angeles, Cal., after a successful trip to New York City.

As a production that lends itself well to musical efforts, the "Call of the Traumerei," a three-reel production by the American Film Mfg. Co., should not be overlooked.

At the Vitagraph Theater, New York, four performances are given daily, except Sunday, at 11:00 A. M., 2:30, 5:30 and 8:30 P. M. On Sunday, the first show is omitted and the following three given as on week days. Bunny and his company appear at the night show only and at the 2:30 matinee on Saturday and Sunday.

A schedule has been arranged, beginning February 16, with the Marcus Loew circuit for the Famous Players production of Mary Pickford in "Hearts Adrift," which is one of the signal successes of current photoplay productions.

The Eastern Feature Film Company, of Boston, has acquired the rights on "The Firefly."

Turner and Dankhen, managers of the Tivoli Opera House, San Francisco, Cal., have contracted to purchase copies of all of the products of the "Balboa Feature Films," which speaks volumes for the high-class merit and quality of the Balboa brand of features.

Anita Stewart, a young lady practically unknown in theatricals, has bounded to the front rank of her profession. Her superb acting in "A Million Bid" (Vitagraph) stamps her as an artist of rare accomplishments.

Students of the Art of Terpsichore will be highly pleased by the excellent work rendered by special artists in the "Flying A" subject, "The Call of the Traumerei."

As the Marcus Loew circuit comprises practically the largest single market for features in the East, it reflects the highest credit on the productions handled by the Wm. L. Sherry Feature Film Co., that this program was scheduled by the Loew interests.

Belle Bennett, leading woman of the "Balboa Feature Films," has recovered from her recent operation following an attack of appendicitis and is out of the hospital. Miss Bennett shortly expects to return to her work with the Balboa Company and her recovery from her illness has brought a shower of congratulations from her legion of friends.

"Outlawed" was last week purchased by General Sales Manager Dunn, of the American Feature Film Company of Boston.

Phil Gleichman has started on the Western trip for the World Film Corporation, his first stop being Denver, where a new office will be opened. E. H. Duffy, traveling representative, goes with him. From Denver they go to open offices in Seattle, Los Angeles and San Francisco. These four offices will be open and ready for business within the next three weeks.

H. M. Horkheimer, president and general manager of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company of Los Angeles, shortly leaves for the East to close up contracts for exclusive territory for the feature productions of his firm and will then visit England and Europe for a similar purpose.

Messrs. McMahan and Jackson, with Nelson F. F. Evans, of the American Feature Film Company of Toledo, are negotiating for the Exclusive Program for Ohio.

The Emby Feature Film Company, of 145 West 45th Street, New York City, has bought the New York State rights, together with the right for the city of New York and Jersey City, of the new Pasquali film in three reels, "Under Suspicion."

A large party of Chicago exhibitors witnessed a private exhibition of George Kleine's latest "Cines" triumph, an eight-reel story of "Napoleon," last week. They were loud in their praise of the beautiful photography, splendid acting and spectacular battle scenes.

Frank C. Wolfe, manager of the Chicago offices of the Pan-American Film Company, has succeeded in passing the five-reel feature, entitled "From Dusk to Dawn," with the Chicago Board of Censorship, without having one foot of film clipped from the picture.

The Italian American Film Corporation, located at 1482 Broadway, Room 1011, is now ready with its projecting room to satisfy and to please all out-of-town buyers. The company always carries six releases in advance and guarantees every buyer that films that are released in this country will be released in Europe sixty days later than the American release date.

KENTUCKY.

AT a recent meeting of the directors of the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, held in Covington, the dates for the third annual convention of the league were settled. The dates settled upon were, April 21-22, and the meeting will be held in Lexington. Louisville was rather well represented at the meeting, as five of her leading picture men were present, including L. J. Dittmar, H. B. Strube, Joseph L. Steurle, Sylvester Grove and Fred Dolle. The meeting was held at the same time that the Ohio State League was holding its meeting in Cincinnati. Although the members of the two leagues met unofficially at the hotels, and were together more or less, no joint action of any kind was taken.

Fred Dolle, of the Broadway Amusement Company, Louisville, said the report that the Broadway was to build a new house is about to be realized. A Louisville firm of architects, Joseph & Joseph, is now working on plans for a new $100,000 house, which is to be of steel, concrete, and as nearly fireproof as modern methods can make it.

R. S. Shrader, manager of the Central Film Service Company, of Louisville, recently returned from a short business trip to the Indianapolis office. These trips are becoming almost a weekly occurrence with Mr. Shrader. He is finding that the plan of sending out advance programs and posters to Kentucky exhibitors a week in advance of showing the pictures is working out nicely. The advertising is well done by the time the films arrive, and they draw good crowds. The Central Exchange has put in a line of Simplex and Powers moving picture machines, the two latest models manufactured, the Power's being a Six-A. The machines will be demonstrated to probable buyers in a demonstrating room, where there has been installed a screen.

D. Levinson, proprietor of the Novelty Theater, Louisville, has returned from a week's pleasure trip to Chicago. He attended the wedding there of a nephew from Terre Haute, Ind. Chief Red Eagle, an Indian, who passed through Louisville a few weeks ago on an alleged walk to Buffalo from the West, for a prize of $25,000 and an automobile, stopped for two days, and addressed the crowds at the Novelty. It was discovered, after his departure, that he failed to leave an Indian suit, which Manager Levinson loaned him for the occasion. The police of Columbus, Ind., found that in the weeks intervening he had "walked" only the sixty miles to that town. He was brought to Louisville, but the charges were dismissed, as he pleaded not guilty, and claimed to have given the suit to someone to turn over to Mr. Levinson. The latter did not push the case very hard, as he rather liked the Carlisle graduate, whom he regarded as a brilliant man.. The Watterson Hotel, of Louisville, and several persons had cases against him for misrepresentation, and a board bill, which were not preferred.

Manager Charles D. Siani, of the Louisville Film Supplies Company, Louisville, is enlarging his stock steadily. The wholesale, as well as the retail ends of the business is increasing rapidly, and it proves that Louisville has been in need of a concern of this kind for some time.

Fred M. Sheldon, Kinemacolor sales manager for the South, representing the Louisville office, returned recently from a five weeks' trip, but left, after spending two days in Louisville, for a trip to Kentucky and Tennessee. During the past few weeks his efforts in the South have been rewarded by sales of installations in some of the largest houses in that section.

The reports which were out recently concerning the merging of the Central and Universal Film Exchanges of Louisville, have been settled by the announcement that the two companies will continue to operate entirely separate of each other, as they have heretofore.

The Walnut Street Theater, of Louisville, which has been playing stock companies for some time, found the venture to be unsuccessful, and after letting the house stand dark for two weeks, started a vaudeville house. At present the management is running seven vaudeville turns besides motion pictures.

The National Theater, of Louisville, under the able management of Manager Lee Goldberg, is coming along nicely, and procuring good patronage for the new theater. High-class motion picture features are being shown, and another factor, which is contributing to the success of the house, is the lively advertising done. One of the negro papers of Louisville is "boosting" the new theater, because of the change in the attitude of the theater concerning colored people. The theater has opened its balcony to colored people, but the local Keith Theater allows them in the gallery only. It is understood that the Walnut Theater will probably allow them in the balcony also. The Keith Theater, on the other hand, is so well established that the whole balcony is needed for white patronage.

The Switow Amusement Company, Louisville, is using film service from the Mutual Film Service Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., and the General Film Service, of St. Louis. This service covers a total of about fifteen houses in Southern Indiana and Kentucky.

Miss B. A. Plessinger, of the Independent Motion Picture Service Company, Louisville, has been confined to her home for two or three days with an attack of tonsilitis. Several years ago she had pneumonia, and as a consequence has had trouble with her throat every winter since.

N. A. Wilkerson, manager of the Tabb Theater, of Mt. Sterling, has leased a large room on Maysville street, and will at once remodel the building for a five-cent moving picture house. The business of the Tabb Theater has grown so largely that another theater is necessary, and it was thought that a cheaper one would do well. A prize of ten dollars has been offered for an appropriate name for the new theater.

The Colonial Amusement Company, of Lexington, has acquired a lease on the Grand Opera House, of Paris, to succeed R. E. Shea & Co., whose lease expires March 1. J. B. Elliott, of Lexington, is president of the Colonial Amusement Company, which controls a chain of motion picture theaters in Central Kentucky. Another house which the company owns in Paris, is the Alamo, and the company has just purchased the Pastime, in Maysville, Ky.

John A. Creech and F. F. Cawood, of Hanlan, are to erect a new motion picture house, to cost about $5,000. The contracts have not been let as yet, but will probably be let in the next few days.

A. D. Kirkpatrick, owner of a coal mine at Beech Creek, recently opened a motion picture house there, which he is beginning to think is a more profitable venture than his mine. Electricity for the house is furnished from the mine plant, a Power's machine being used in the theater. Three reels a day, Universal program, are used.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Hind Estate Company has taken out a building permit for the erection of a moving picture theater on the east side of Larkin street, near O'Farrell, the estimated cost of which is $11,000. The large number of apartment houses being erected in this section has led to the decision to establish a theater there.

The controversy in regard to the repairing of the Globe Theater in the Mission district has been settled and this theater will be opened by Turner & Dahnken as soon as the needed alterations are made. The house will be put in first-class shape and is expected to again take its place as one of the leading places of amusement in the Mission. The theater seats 1,500.

A great get-together meeting of exhibitors and others interested in the motion picture business will be held this week at the Techau Tavern, a banquet at mid-night to be the attraction.

The annual Policemen's Ball, to aid the department's widows' and orphans' society, will be held on February 21. G. M. Anderson, of the Essanay Company, popularly known as Broncho Billy, has volunteered to make a film to be shown at this event, depicting a holdup, pursuit by police, battle and capture.

It has not been long since a three-day run was considered a long run for motion pictures, but now many feature films are shown for a week at large theaters. The Tivoli, under the Turner & Dahnken management, changes its program not oftener than once a week and is now closing an extremely successful two weeks' run on the "Lion and the Mouse," a Lubin picture, released through the General Film Company.

The Gaiety Theater is again showing musical comedies and the motion picture, "Traffic in Souls," a Universal production, which was shown there for a week, is now at the Savoy, where it is enjoying a good run as a twenty-five cent attraction.

The Sunset Motion Picture Company has been incorporated here with a capital stock of $250,000, the directors being G. Moore, J. C. Wheeler, Jr., and R. C. Thayer, San Francisco to be the principal place of business.

George E. Chamberlain has filed a statement to comply with the State law to indicate that he is the owner of the Independent Film Exchange. Offices are maintained in the Grant Building.

The All Star Features Distributors, Inc., have filed articles of incorporation, with a capital stock of $30,000, the directors being E. Salomon, O. Samuels and J. Samuels.

Word has been received here by officials of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition to the effect that one of the features of the display of the United States Government, which will be made at the exposition in 1915, will be motion pictures showing various branches of government activity. The sum of $25,000 has been set aside for taking these pictures.

Work on the Washington state building on the exposition grounds will be commenced shortly and a feature of this structure will be a completely equipped motion picture theater on the main floor, seating three or four hundred people. A. F. Helde, of Seattle, is the architect in charge.

The State of Massachusetts is also preparing to erect a magnificent building and this will also have a motion picture theater where pictures will be displayed, depicting the principal industries of the State and places of interest.

Many inquiries are being received by Panama-Pacific International Exposition officials from manufacturers of motion picture cameras and theater equipment in regard to the display that will be made here in 1915, and so much interest is being taken in this that an unusual exhibit is promised. Theodore Hardee, chief of the department of Liberal Arts, states that one of the features of the display will be a demonstration of the use of motion pictures in the recording of surgical operations and in biological laboratory studies. Exhibit space in the Liberal Arts Building will be free and exhibits will be entered for awards by an international jury.

State Labor Commissioner John P. McLaughlin draws attention to the fact that many industrial establishments throughout the state have become liable to a severe penalty because of their failure to comply with the factory registration law passed by the last legislature. The law in question states that all factories, workshops, mills and other manufacturing establishments in which five or more persons are employed must register with the bureau of labor statistics before January 1, 1914, and that all new concerns must register within thirty days. Not only are factories proper included within the scope of the act, but all manner of workshops, etc., whether operated as independent firms or simply as adjuncts of retail or wholesale concerns. The law covers the manufacture of moving picture films and there are a number of firms in this line which have not complied with its provisions. The headquarters of the Labor Commissioner are at 948 Market street, San Francisco.

A contract has been awarded by the Arnold Estate of Richmond, Cal., for the erection of a theater at Richmond and Tunnel avenues, at a cost of about $40,000. It is reported that the structure will be occupied by the Royal Theater, now located further west on Richmond avenue.

Harold J. McCurry, who conducts a large photographic establishment at San Francisco, now has a motion picture department, which is thoroughly equipped for the taking of pictures and the development of film.

The Theater Fresno, Fresno, Cal., made a great hit last week by showing motion pictures of Lincoln Beachey looping the loop in his aeroplane. This aviator appeared at Fresno a short time ago under the management of Fred W. Voigt, who is also manager of the Theater Fresno, and aroused such enthusiasm there that everyone seemed anxious to see him in moving pictures. Pathe's Weekly regularly at the Theater Fresno is another hit scored by Manager Voigt.

The Oakland Photo Theater, Oakland, Cal., conducted by Turner & Dahnken, is now changing pictures but twice a week, instead of four times, as formerly. A seven-piece orchestra is maintained here and the price of admission is 10 and 20 cents.

The T. & D. Theater, at Sacramento, Cal., is the only 10 cent moving picture house in that city, all others charging but 5 cents. Pictures are changed twice a week and all feature films are shown. A pipe organ furnishes the music.

The Rudolph Wurlitzer Company has established Pacific coast headquarters at 985 Market street, San Francisco, on the second floor of the Musical Building.

WILLIAM FOX, President TELEPHONE, 7340 BRYANT

The Selig "Adventures of Kathlyn" series was shown at the King Theater, the Gem, the Strand, and the Beaver Theater, in Toronto. This series has taken Toronto by storm, and interest is added to it by the fact the stories are being published in one of the Toronto dailies.

Manager Schlesinger, in addition to changing the color scheme in the lobby of the Theater Francais, has introduced something new in the form of a salon de toilette for the lady patrons of this popular house. Another new idea of his is a tango contest, which is held every Wednesday evening.

H. J. Brock, of the Mark-Brock Amusement Co., transferred the ten years' lease for $30,000, of the Scala Theater, to Lawande Bros., who operate the King Edward on St. Lawrence Boulevard. The new owners assume the liabilities of a lease at an annual rental of $10,000, and at the end of their term the building, with its equipment, reverts to the owner, Hugh Doheny.

The Rex Theater, St. Denis Boulevard, recently opened after undergoing extensive alterations.

The statement of the treasurer, Captain Brosseau, at the annual meeting of the Firemen's Pension and Benevolent Association, showed a surplus of over $4,000. The surplus is due to the amount of money taken in through moving picture entertainments given last summer in the Theater Francais. The amount realized during the two weeks the pictures ran was $23,528.65.

The Scala Theater, St. Lawrence Boulevard, which has come under new management, is showing first run moving pictures and a strong vaudeville bill. A full orchestra has been engaged, and a good show can be relied upon.

The Strand, St. Catherine street West, is continuing to show good pictures. It makes a specialty of showing the Famous Players releases.

A new idea at the Theater Francais is a Tango team, who teach the patrons of this popular theater all the latest dances.

The use of the movies as an aid in the instruction of children met with approval at the annual convention of the Catholic lay teachers of Montreal.

Several moving picture theaters in Montreal give the reports on the screen of the big professional hockey matches.

The Montreal Theater Hockey League is proving a success. The larger picture houses of this city are represented in it.

A dispute over the sale of a moving picture theater at 955 St. Catherine street, East, was settled by the judgment of Justice Monet in the case of Frank Henke vs. Conrad Valee. The plaintiff claimed that he agreed to purchase the theater on condition that the place was wired and fixed in accordance with the regulations of the Canadian Fire Underwriters' Association. He subsequently discovered that he would need to spend a considerable sum of money in putting the place in a condition to comply with the regulations and he claimed $250. Judgment for plaintiff for full amount.

The Prince of Wales Moving Picture Theater has sold its equipment and furnishings by auction.

"Montreal Sports and Ice Harvest," was the title of a film given a private showing at the Tivoli Theater, St. Catherine and Bleury streets. This film was manufactured by the Premier Film Mfg. Company, with headquarters in Montreal and a studio at Lachine. Photoplays of every description will be produced by this company, on Canadian soil, and by Canadian talent.

The Province of Quebec Board of Censors banned the film "Traffic in Souls."

A recent attraction at the Electra Theater, St. Catherine street, East, was "Fantomas," a Gaumont feature. The crowds which fill the theater at every show are a proof of its great popularity.

The Bellevue Theater, St. Denis Boulevard, is showing moving pictures and French Stock Company productions during the winter months.

The Colonial Theater, St. Catherine street, West, is continuing to please its many patrons.

The Moulin Rouge Theater, St. Catherine and Amherst streets, one of the Independent Amusement Company houses, is offering a fine Mutual program.

James Sperdakos, proprietor of the Fairyland Theater, 475 Notre Dame street, West, one of the largest moving picture theaters in Montreal, was called before Judge Choquet, of the Montreal Juvenile Court, recently, and asked to account for the number of complaints that children under the legal age were being admitted to his theater. Mr. Sperdakos claimed that the youngsters came in with grown-ups who purported to be their parents. He was allowed to go, but was informed that on the receipt of any more complaints, his license would probably be cancelled under a new clause of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, passed by the Quebec Legislature.

During a recent visit to Quebec, Judge Choquet had a new clause in the law put through, dealing with moving picture houses. This provides that upon a second conviction for allowing children under 15 years of age to visit a theater unaccompanied, the proprietor may have his license canceled. As soon as this session of legislature closes the new clause that Judge Choquet depends upon will come into effect. Previous convictions will count against the moving picture proprietors and the judge is considering warning a number of houses that have been convicted once and against whom complaints are still being received.

His Majesty's Theater, Sherbrooke, Quebec, is attracting large audiences with a progam of General Film Company releases and vaudeville.

The Casino, Sydney, N. S., shows licensed pictures and gives its patrons the reports of the big hockey games.

The Imperial, St. John, N. B., is like her sister-house in Montreal, continuing to be crowded at every show. Famous Players releases are featured.

The first occasion of moving pictures being used at the University of Toronto was when F. N. Speller, of Pittsburgh, illustrated his lecture on steel.

Acker's Palace Theater, Sydney, N. S., gives three shows a day. A four-piece orchestra furnishes the music, and Mutual movies are shown.

It is rumored that the erection of a new theater, in Fort William, Ont., is being considered. It will cost about $100,000.

"The Third Degree," a Lubin production, released through General Film Company, was successfully shown recently at the Daylight Theater, Saskatoon, Sask.

A report from Toronto says: "A new moving picture theater, American capital, will be erected here pretty soon. It will seat about 2,700. It will show only colored pictures, and will be of the dark theater type, the interior to be painted black in order to show up the pictures to better advantage.

Manager McNaughton, of the Sherman Theater, Saskatoon, has introduced a new feature, by which his patrons may take dancing lessons in the Sherman. The lessons are given daily, from 11 to 12:30 A. M., and from 5 to 6 P. M.

The Province of Ontario Board of Censors condemns on an average about one film every week. Until recently, after each film had been passed, a few feet of certificate film was attached to it. This custom, however, has been done away with, and moving picture theater proprietors are now required to show a certificate in front of their houses for each film being shown that day. The advantage of this system is that the policeman on the beat can tell if each film has been inspected.

The Tivoli, on the site of the old Nickel, is featuring the "Mutual Girl" series.

GALLAGHER.

INDIANA.

WITH all due respect to the various types and makes of screens on the market, Ed. J. Addy, proprietor of My Theater, Indianapolis, says he has one that is giving him better service than any of them, because he is able to take care of distortion so easily. His screen is made of wall paper. Just common ordinary wall paper, plain white. Over this goes a coat of shellac and over the shellac a coat of aluminum. The beauty of the Addy screen is that it is inexpensive, and when it becomes dark, as they all inevitably do, from dust, the surface is renewable at a cost of 80 cents for aluminum, and wages. In Addy's case there was no labor cost. He puts it on himself.

He warns anybody putting on the shellac to throw it on fast, as it does not take the aluminum after it has dried. His first screen was not satisfactory on this account. His second was an improvement, because he used a helper. The two were able to throw on the shellac very fast and they had applied the aluminum coat before the shellac dried. Next time he thinks of making a change, Add says he will get linoleum instead of paper, as he has since learned that linoleum can be had in sizes large enough to make the screen without a seam. Several linoleum made screens are in use in Indianapolis.

W. H. Lipps, Alexandria, Ind., estimates his loss from the fire which destroyed the Elks building, in which he had the opera house, at $2,800, not counting the time lost on account of not being able to show. He has rented a room across from the old location, and is having seats put in. He expects to be open by February 20. The old location seated 700. The new will not seat more than 300.

Under the slogan, "Indiana for Indiana," the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association is sending a rally letter to all the exhibitors in the state, urging them to pay up their dues and be prepared to attend a "real convention" in March. Attention is called to the fact that the Indiana association at the last session of the Indiana legislature was able to kill the Firemen Bill, which would have cost every exhibitor giving one show a day, $2, and those giving two shows, $4 a day; the drastic provisions of the Fire Marshal Bill, which would have cost every exhibitor a considerable sum for remodeling; the bill to prevent children under 16 attending a picture show; the bill to provide state censorship.

The International Bible Students' Association pictures were shown here Sunday in the City Hall. Rev. Charles C. Russell, of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, explained them.

Ed Sourbier, who now owns three theaters and has an interest in a film service company, is to build another theater. He is to call it the Keystone, the name being a compliment to the Mutual Film Service, which he has used almost exclusively in all of his houses, every one of which is making money. The house will seat about 600 and is only a few doors from the traction terminal station in a square which boasts three theaters already, one of them a vaudeville house. Every one of the houses plays to a big business day and night. The architect has plans about complete.

Managers of the Art and the Grand, at Gary, Ind., are racing each other to get releases on the Selig series "The Adventures of Kathlyn," which is proving a great drawing card.

Al Radabaugh, who recently sold the Palace Theater in Hartford City, has purchased the New Star Theater, owned by Herbert U. Dwyer, at Dunkirk.

John Smith is building a house on the site of his aerodome. He plans to have seats for 500, and expects to put up a thoroughly modern and well equipped photoplay house. Boswell has a population of 1,000 and is the center of a prosperous farming district. The theater is being welcomed, as heretofore there has been no amusement.

Burton Garrett, Indiana agent for the Blache Film Company, succeeded in his fight for possession of the "Battle of Waterloo" film which the Exhibitors' Feature Company, of Toledo, Ohio, attempted to exhibit at Huntington, in violation of Garrett's state right.

James Staley, owner of the Royal Theater, Frankfort, has installed two new Simplex machines. The machines are equipped with Gundlach lenses. This is the fifth set of machines that Staley has used in his theater.

The northwestern corner of Indiana in what is known as Chicago territory is being covered with advertising by the Universal company, which urges reading of the daily film story in the Record-Herald and a visit to the local house to see the film itself at night.

W. H. Wilson has opened the Colonial Theater, Indianapolis, with a strictly film program. The house has had a precarious existence, being first opened for vaudeville, then in turn by a number of stock companies, then it was put on a "ten-twent-thirt" circuit, but each enterprise failed to draw the necessary crowds. Mr. Wilson is running four shows a day and is getting such crowds as to justify a belief the hoodoo has been broken. Mr. Wilson is from Cincinnati, where he is interested in several houses.

Grover Ranck, manager of the Wild Opera House, Noblesville, Ind., for the People's Amusement Company, has been transferred to Indianapolis, where he will manage the new Victoria Theater, and another theater the company is now building. Mr. Ranck came originally from Arizona to Indiana. He has been everything in the show business, from manager of a circus to end man in a minstrel. The new house being built by the People's Amusement Company is to be called the Empress. It is in an aristocratic neighborhood and will be one of the beautiful suburban houses of the city.

"Joan of Arc," the World Special Films Corporation feature, is in big demand in Indiana, on account of its educational value.

NEW ENGLAND.

CENSORS may be named to view moving pictures in Beverly, Mass., according to a new form of license, which was announced by Mayor H. A. MacDonald on February 13. The license fee was boosted from $10 to $30, and theater managers may take a monthly license at $3 a month. The holders of the license agree to discontinue immediately any reel objected to by the mayor or his representative. Children under fourteen are to be allowed in the playhouses only on Saturday afternoons and holidays, and in the evening, only when accompanied by parent or guardian. This is the first time that any comprehensive set of rules has been drawn up governing Beverly theaters.

To mark the eighth week of the successful run of the Universal feature, "Traffic in Souls," at the Globe Theater, Boston, souvenir phototones of Miss Ethel Granden were given to every lady attending the Tuesday afternoon performance, February 17, and the Thursday afternoon performance, February 19. The business being done with "Traffic in Souls" is simply capacity, and this Universal subject will remain at the Globe for an indefinite run.

Dancing moving pictures, showing the Castle Walk, the Tango, and other dances, as exploited by Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle, were featured above everything else this week at B. F. Keith's theater, Boston. It was noticed, and commented on, however, that the newspaper advertisements were so written that it took a careful reading to bring out the fact that it was moving pictures of Mr. and Mrs. Castle that were offered, and not the performers in person.

King Baggot, of Universal fame, found it impossible to accept the invitation tendered him to lead the grand march at the first annual ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, to be held on February 17, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Baggot wired his regret in the matter to Harry Wasserman, of the league, on February 13. When this appears in print the ball shall have gone down in history, but as we write, everyone connected with the industry in Massachusetts is at fever heat over the coming affair. A large silver cup is to be tendered the company having the best representation and booth at the ball, and all the local exchanges are making preparations with an eye to bearing away the prize trophy.

Hugh O'Neill, manager of the Star Theater, Boston, reports fairly good business, even in face of the cold weather. Warner's Features are usually offered by Mr. O'Neill, together with the Mutual program.

General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the Universal's Boston offices, reports the shipment of one hundred reels of Universal pictures to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, a marine station. Mr. Eslow does a large export business, in addition to his regular New England business, which is very large.

Moving picture machines are being installed in many of the state institutions in New England for the benefit of the inmates. This idea has been meeting with distinct success, and it will be continued.

Joe Knowles, the Boston artist, who attained fame as a "primitive" man in the Maine woods, addressed the newsboys of Boston this week, at 277 Tremont Street. Mr. Knowles gave an intimate story of his experiences in the Maine woods, and showed two reels of pictures, which illustrated his exploits.

L. Wesley ("Wesley says so") has decided to use the Universal program in his Gardner Theater, Gardner, Mass. "Wesley says" business is good, but that he hopes to improve it with the program of the "Big U," over which he is very enthusiastic.

Fred B. Murphy, manager of the Boston office of the World Special Films Corporation, held a special run off of "Joan of Arc," the five-reel feature, at the South End Theater, Boston, on February 11. This feature drew unstinted praise from those present.

A recent incorporation was the Emmett Theater Company, of Boston. This company incorporated for $4,500, with James Bloomberg, William Frank and Harry Adelson named as the officers.

The Ideal Theater Company incorporated this week for $5,000. The promoters are all well known to the New England trade, and are as follows: Hiram Abrams, Silas H. Bunce, W. E. Greene, Harry Asher and Joseph M. Levenson. The concern incorporated for $5,000.

Another new concern to start operations this week was the National Advertisers' Motion Picture Weekly, Inc., of Boston, with Nat Burgess, Frank E. Farnsworth and James H. Scannell as the officers. The concern incorporated for $10,000.

Dorchester, Mass., or that part of it in the vicinity of Washington Street, near Harvard, is to have a new theater, one that is to cost $50,000. When completed the building will have a seating capacity of 800, and will be devoted to photoplays and illustrated songs. The building will be 115 feet long by 63 feet wide, and will be of modern construction in every respect. It will be built of brick, steel and concrete. The plans call for ample exits and every known means of protection against fire. The auditorium will be 82 feet 6 inches by 63 feet wide, the stage 25 by 63 feet, with a building of 20 by 30 giving ample room for dressing rooms. There are to be boxes on either side of the stage. A gentlemen's smoking room, a ladies' parlor, a check room and other modern conveniences have been arranged for. The house will be finished in old rose, and the boxes in white and gold. The lobby, which will be a spacious one, will be finished in Italian Verdi marble, and the ticket office in mahogany. Full sized opera chairs have been contracted for. The theater, to be known as the Magnet, has arranged for the entire Universal program, secured from General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the Universal's Boston offices. Eight reels are to be offered in each change of program. The theater is well located, and should prosper from the start.

White's Opera House, Concord, N. H., reports good business and getting even better. The Opera House is now regularly featuring the three-part Warner productions, contracted for with Manager Harry F. Campbell, of Warner's Boston offices.

Harry F. Campbell, New England manager of Warner's Features, with offices in Boston, is unusually busy these days, as he is one of the most active members of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, and, incidentally, part owner of a prosperous chain of photoplay theaters owned in partnership with Samuel Grant. Mr. Campbell reports that he has formed a complete circuit of the Warner program in New Hampshire. A full week's supply of the Warner features is started at one point in New Hampshire, and from there goes the rounds of that state, each exhibitor shipping the films to the next theater on his circuit.

George I. Appleby, of the Mutual's Boston offices, says that things are looking very nicely for his program.

The R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, of Massachuetts, incorporated at Boston this week for $50,000, with R. D. Marson, Joseph M. Levenson and Amaziah Mayo as the promoters. Mr. R. D. Marson ranks among the widest and most favorably known in the New England trade, and is doing a large supply business. Mr. Marson probably sells more machines than any other three concerns in this section, and formerly was manager of the General's Boston offices, and only left to embark in business for himself.

As if the past week was not busy enough for Massachusetts, exhibitors with legislative matters and their ball on their minds, Mayor James M. Curley, of Boston, called all exhibitors to meet him on February 14. Representatives of more than 70 theaters answered the summons, and were informed by Mayor Curley that the fee for Sunday night entertainments, consisting of moving pictures and vaudeville performances, will be advanced to $10, or just double the present fee, starting the first Sunday in March. Each house in the city will be accorded the privilege of running Sunday night shows. The Mayor figures that the city will increase its revenue from that source some $23,460 a year, and make the total revenue $35,420, instead of $11,960, which the city is receiving at the present time. For the Sunday night performances, there are 46 houses in the city enjoying the privilege and 22 which are not. There are 10 legitimate theaters which have not applied for the privilege. During the past, Boston photoplay houses in certain districts were unable to get a Sunday license from the Mayor's office. This was due to the objections of the neighborhood and the clergy, but Mayor Curley, known at the "Hub" as "Candidate Courageous," is not influenced by such narrow minded antagonism to Sunday shows. The Mayor stated to the exhibitors that he thought that the photoplay houses in Boston were well conducted, and that he had no fault to find with them. He assured all those present that he would always give exhibitors a fair deal. M. Douglas Flattery, Boston representative of the Loew enterprises, asked the Mayor if it would not be possible for the smaller photoplay theaters to open an hour or two earlier than the present Sunday hour of 7 P. M. His Honor stated he would have License Clerk Casey look into this angle of the matter, with a view to finding how the church people would meet such an innovation.

Chief Whitney, of the State Police, Boston, gives notice that he will prosecute both the manager and operator at any house where the so-called five-minute law is violated.

A new ordinance, introduced into the common council of Pittsfield, Mass., by President John H. Langley, was referred to the committe on ordinances. It calls for a fine of $2 to $20 against exhibitors, in case the number of reels advertised are not given at each performance.

John E. Talcott, of Hartford, Conn., has plans calling for a two-story theater building, 110 by 130 feet. The policy of the theater will be moving pictures.

Manager Harry Asher, of the Famous Players' Film Company, of New England, Boston, gave a private exhibition of "Paid in Full" this week, and the feature was given unstinted praise by those present. "Out of Darkness" and "The Secret of the Mine," are two recent features of Mr. Asher's that appeal to the New England trade.

The United Feature Film Company is an offshoot of the United Booking offices, with offices at 162 Tremont Street, Boston. Mr. C. Wesley Fraser is in charge of the department, which is to handle feature films only.

The Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company, Mr. William Fox's new promotion, is due to open its Boston offices immediately, from which point the New England territory will be covered. Mr. Lewis S. Levin is slated for the position as Boston manager, so it is understood.

The George Kleine attractions have a Boston office in the Colonial Building.

W. V. Hart is now manager of the Mutual's Springfield, Mass., office, having been transferred from the New York offices of this concern.

The Bijou Dream Theater, Boston, has taken on renewed vigor since J. W. Craig was appointed manager. Mr. Craig has been associated with the Keith interests in Boston for years, and knows his business.

"Hearts Adrift," the Famous Players' feature, pulled in big business for Manager W. E. Reeves, of the Nickel Theater, Portland, Maine.

Manager M. C. Blumenberg, of the Portland Theater, Portland, Maine, is now doing a capacity business with feature pictures and vaudeville.

ANDREW ZUCCARO and Charles Mussett, motion picture show proprietors of Fort Worth, were discharged by the State Supreme Court of Texas. They were charged with violating an injunction from operating their shows in Fort Worth on Sunday. The court did not pass on the issues in the case, but discharged them because the injunction had expired before they were cited for contempt.

J. J. Parker and M. R. Carb, of Fort Worth, Texas, have been selling stock for a new moving picture theater to be erected in North Fort Worth at a cost of $20,000. Early plans call for its location at the corner of North Main and Twenty-fourth Streets. A seating capacity of 700 is called for. The North Fort Worth Improvement Club is interested in the project.

C. E. Kesand and Hugh Cowan, of Shawnee, Okla., have purchased a moving picture theater at Wichita Falls, Texas.

The Order of Eagles, at Atchison, Kan., is contemplating the erection of a theater.

The Culberson building, at Wynnewood, Okla., will be remodeled by Charles Green, who will open a picture theater.

E. D. Brewer will remain as manager of the Elk's Royal Theater, at Port Arthur, Texas, although the lease has been transferred from the Port Arthur Amusement Company to J. H. Holton, of San Antonio, Texas.

Free moving pictures in the garden from April 15 through the summer is a part of the plans for an amusement pier at Corpus Christie, Texas.

The first floor of the opera house at Tecumseh, Okla., has been leased by Oscar Drake, who will open a moving picture theater.

Ben Orzeck has opened a moving picture theater on Main Street in Brenham, Texas.

W. N. Ingraham has rented the Hill building at Fairfax, Okla., for a moving picture show.

An airdome is being erected at Bloomington, Texas, by L. W. Brown. It has been rented to a Mr. Holliday.

H. Thomas has sold a half interest in the Skydome Theater, at Orange, Texas, to A. Kent Watson. A number of changes will be made before the place is opened again on May 1.

F. M. Tull, owner of the Folly Theater, at Oklahoma City, Okla., has taken possession of the house from the Interstate Company and will run vaudeville and pictures.

The Superior Amusement Company, Incorporated, planned to open about February 15 a moving picture theater at Florence, Ariz.

Natham Salmon, of Santa Fe, New Mexico, has awarded the contract for a new moving picture theater, seating 500, to be erected on San Francisco street in that city.

THE City Council at Galva has decided that moving picture theaters must pay a license fee. In addition, it has been decided to prohibit Sunday shows.

J. H. Webster has opened a moving picture show in Jay's Hall at Steelville, where he will operate until he completes his new opera house, the construction of which began some time ago.

Hurt & Sullivan, who recently established the Majestic Theater at Paxton, have sold their business to E. J. Miller of Wilkesbarre, Pa. Miller formerly was connected with the Buffalo Bill Feature Film Company and the Film Supply Company of Pennsylvania.

E. A. Stein is now in charge of the musical program at the Capitol Theater in Pekin.

The principal and the faculty of the Kent School, at Rockford, recently stood sponsor for an exhibition of moving pictures at the Majestic Theater in that city. The films were educational in nature and the house gained by the championship of the teachers.

Moving picture theaters of Evanston have issued passes to the members of the new board of censorship. John Keane, of the firm of Bodkin & Keane, which is well known in Illinois photoplay circles, is a member of the board.

The Majestic Amusement Company, of East St. Louis, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $4,000, to construct amusement, theatrical and moving picture enterprises. The incorporators are H. H. Hebenstreit, Stella Burton and G. H. Morrison.

H. A. Fleckels has been making arrangements to reopen the Majestic Theater at Lockport.

W. H. Woodley, of Kewanee, has gone to Indianapolis to take charge of one of the traveling organizations, presenting a "Photo Drama of Creation and Religious History." A number of these will be sent over the United States by the International Bible Student's Association, which believes that in this manner it can further its cause—diligent study of the Scriptures.

Picture houses in Morris have been permitted to reopen after a quarantine on account of a smallpox scare.

Cement, road machinery and other firms interested in the construction of modern highways have been having films made to exploit their own products, but none of them really foresaw the possibilities until a school of instruction for county highway engineers was held the other day at the University of Illinois at Urbana. These county engineers were all new appointees—the road-building law has just gone into effect—and there was lots they didn't know about road building. Their minds were open to impression and the power of the motion picture in doing this was a revealation to the highway officials who had labored so long with blue prints, drawings and still photographs in preaching better roads and bridges to local highway officials. One county engineer declared the firms formed the most important part of the course of instruction.

Burr Swan, recently featured with his pictures at Pittsfield the harp orchestra music of one DeSosey who "played the pictures." A representative of The World remembers Sosey before he acquired the De and feels assured this was a pleasing small city attraction for he is a good musician.

H. W. Lewis, who has been manager of the Gaiety Theater in Galesburg, is now manager of the Gaiety Theater in Ottawa, succeeding Roy Rogan, who assumed the management of the Orpheum Theater in Joliet.

The editor of the Morgan Park Post makes a direct appeal to the church people of that community to patronize the Ridge Theater. "Churches, church people, help the little theater! The help will prove mutual and reciprocal, for this clean, well-ventilated moving picture exhibit of the good and great things of earth has proved and is proving to be a big factor in influencing our young folk by lessons that are making life impressions. We have all talked about Practical Christianity. Here it is and in plenty. Don't let it languish as you have done."

The Majestic Theater, at Streator, lent a neighborly shoulder to the wheel when the Greely-Parent-Teachers' Club was raising a fund for a victrola and magic lantern. This class of benefit performances pays more dividends than the benefits for secret societies. It gets the parents into the photoplay house and wins over hitherto enemies of moving pictures. The Majestic is interested in a voting contest being conducted by the business men of Streator.

Bert Ingram is now associated with Hardin Green in the management of the Majestic Theater at Lincoln.

It is hoped the day will come when the moving picture show will be sufficient attraction to keep the residents of small towns from visiting the performances given by "medicine shows." One picture house in a small Illinois town recently had opposition of this sort and was forced to start his show very much earlier in the evening or be satisfied with a small share of his regular patronage.

The Kozy Theater, at Galesburg, is participating in a pony contest, designed to bring business for the merchants of that city.

The Queen Theater has been opened at Thirteenth and Winstanley avenues, in East St. Louis. It will be a five-and-ten cent moving picture house. Two performances will be given each night and matinee Sunday.

[illegible] S. Wateran that he had leased and was remodeling the old Barrison Theater, in Waukegan for a [illegible] report of difficulty. Carl Muller, who some time ago purchased the Elite Theater from Waterman, announced through the press that Waterman had agreed not to re-enter business in Waukegan. Waterman denied it and what promised to end in legal battle began.

Comment has been made from time to time in these columns of the popularity in Springfield of the Biograph two-part picture, "Oil and Water." This picture has been shown in that city for the fourth time and for the second time under the auspices of the Springfield high school.

The Grand Opera House building, at Jacksonville, has been sold to Berty Sutton, of Springfield, and Fletcher Hooper and Harry Hoffman, both of Jacksonville.

The recently organized Monarch Theater and Amusement Company, of Springfield, in which J. W. Brown is one of the prime movers, plans to open a vaudeville and moving picture house at Ninth street and North Grand avenue about the first of April. This will be one of the few photoplay houses in the outlying sections of Springfield. One has been running in what is known as Ridgely, farther north, but it has a large foreign population to draw from. The new building will be of the arched-roof type popular with skating rinks, seating 450, and later a more substantial building may be erected. Amateur night once a week, one single and one double act of vaudeville and three reels of pictures will make up the program. It is reported that the plans of the Monarch Company include vaudeville and pictures for Farmer City, Williamsville, Gillespie, Girard and Illiopolis.

Zest has been added to the movement for the widespread use of moving pictures for educational purposes in Illinois by the enlistment of State Senator H. S. Magill, Jr., president of the Illinois State Teachers' Association as a champion. Magill is one of the leading educators of the state and as superintendent of the city schools he has an excellent opportunity to do good work with pictures. Speaking of a project for a circuit of films—or three circuits—Southern, Central and Northern—he said: "A circuit of schools such as has been suggested could, I believe, accomplish a lot with the films." He thinks that more attention will be paid in the future to the possibility of using picture machines. More and more school buildings are being constructed with auditoriums to fit them for social center work and these need only fire-proof operating rooms to be used for the projection of pictures.

JACOB SIMON, formerly manager of the Knickerbocker Theater, at Holland, Mich., and prior to that manager of the Bell, in Benton Harbor, Mich., is now manager of the Caldwell Theater, in St. Joseph, Mich.

Films showing the making of drugs were recently used successfully by the faculty of the Cleveland School of Pharmacy at Cleveland, Ohio, for instruction work. The pictures were made in a laboratory in Indianapolis.

Mrs. H. B. McKenzie and her son, both experienced in the moving picture business, are now the proprietors of the Casino Theater on lower Main street, at Charles City, Ia., having purchased the house from L. H. Hooker.

Fred Pruska, of Chelsea, Ia., is preparing to erect, next spring, a modern photoplay theater, 60 x 20 feet.

Lawrence & Lawrence, contractors, will erect a new brick or cement stone opera house in Lake View, Ia., the coming season.

The Burke Amusement Company, which recently filed articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State of Wisconsin, will have its headquarters at Kenosha. It will have capital stock of $5,000. The object is to organize a circuit of moving picture and vaudeville houses in Wisconsin.

The Osceola Amusement Company has been formed at Osceola, Ia., by T. H. Hoffman, James Mullen and A. A. Haley, of Des Moines, Ia., and has taken a five-year lease on the City Opera House, which for the last eighteen years has been conducted by I. A. Touet, of that city. The new concern, which operates a string of amusement houses in the territory tributary to Des Moines, will book a number of attractions for the Osceola house, but will have ample time for a large amount of vaudeville and pictures.

The Citizen's Commission, of Milwaukee, Wis., made public announcement that the reason it stopped the exhibition of the Keystone comedy, "Rebecca's Wedding Day," was because the direct representative of a religious organization was held up to ridicule. The statement by President G. R. Radley also said "the actions incident to the hiring of a bridegroom for a ponderously fat daughter becomes decidedly vulgar."

The town council, at Toronto, Ia., is being accused of heaping troubles on the head of moving picture men by the passage of two ordinances. In the first measure performances are prohibited where the manager makes connection with his own engine for light. The second puts a tax on all shows charging over ten cents. Where a show charges fifteen cents or twenty-five cents, half of the receipts go to the city. It is said the town is too small to do a profitable business at ten cents and the residents may go photoplayless under the present conditions.

W. A. Middleton and D. D. Gephart purchased a building in Iowa Falls, Ia., with a view to remodeling it for use as a moving picture theater until next spring, when they will erect a $15,000 combination photoplay theater and that building. This gives Iowa Falls three picture houses and it is said a fourth is contemplated by a Mr. Brooks, of Cedar Falls, Ia.

The Modern Woodmen of America Camp, at Royalton, Wis., is erecting a new opera house.

Special educational films for the children will be a feature of the operation of the Star Theater, at Mitchellville, Ia., which has been re-opened under the management of Grant Walker. Mr. Walker now has entire control of the house and will personally manage it. Mrs. Margaret Walker will have charge of the music.

John A. Larkin and John Hurley have taken over the lease on the Park Picture Theater, at Waukesha, Wis., which formerly was held by George Freelson, and will conduct the house. Larkin was formerly of the Shubert Stock Company and Hurley of the Hurley-Riley Company, of Milwaukee.

E. Jacobson & Son have sold the Star Theater, at Newton, Ia., to F. W. Walters, who formerly conducted a picture show in Iowa City, but more recently has been in the photoplay business at Centerville. Mr. and Mrs. Jacobson and son, Ray, all of whom have been associated in the management of the Star, will go to a farm in Montana. Walters will continue with a "Mutual Movies" policy.

C. F. Butz has sold the Gem Theater, at Hudson, Wis., to George A. Walker, of Minneapolis, Minn.

W. E. DesChamps will get the new Lake Linden, Mich., opera house it is reported. The contract for remodeling has been let to Ernest Myers.

The advent of a pedagogue in the photoplay field, especially as a manager, is always interesting because there are so many possibilities for advancing the business. Leslie Carey, teacher of science in the schools at Greenfield, Ohio, has purchased the Forum moving picture theater, at Hillsboro, Ohio, and promises to set a high standard in its operation.

C. H. Maclaurin has sold the Gem Theater, at Gladstone, Mich., to Charles Schuler, of Manistique.

Announcement has been made by Charles M. Blatz, of Sandusky, Ohio, that he will erect on Jackson Street, between Market and Washington streets, in Fremont, Ia., a new moving picture theater, to cost about $50,000. It is expected the house will be ready for opening by July 1.

The Bijou Theater, in Benton Harbor, Mich., becomes a picture house as the result of a deal which recently took place in that city. W. C. Sellanson and E. J. Miller leased the Bell Opera House and will book various theatrical attractions. In the summer time the Bell will be closed, the vaudeville attractions switched to the Bijou and the Princess then will become the home of the photoplay features.

L. F. Morgan & Company took out a building permit in Omaha, Neb., for the erection of a moving picture theater at 3213-14 North Twenty-fourth street, to cost $5,000.

The Florian Machan building, in Toledo, Ia., has been remodeled for a moving picture theater, which has been opened by Jay Wyman.

E. L. Thompson has purchased the half interest of James Williams in the moving picture show at New Virginia, Iowa.

The Peerless Film Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $25,000 to deal in moving picture films, etc. The incorporaters are E. H. Brient, E. L. Deupree and E. G. Sourbier.

A building on the south side of the square at Fontanelle, Ia., has been leased by L. A. Brink, who, after remodeling and the installation of new seats, hopes to have it open March 1 as a first-class moving picture theater.

Talk of a board of censorship for moving pictures in Benton Harbor, Mich., is the result of a protest made recently against the showing of a Dalton Brothers film at the Swastika in that city. H. S. Whitney, an attorney, protested against the picture to the mayor and a sort of an impromptu censorship board, consisting of city officials, business men and newspaper men were gathered, looked over the picture and passed it. Attorney Whitney then advocated inspection of all films shown in Benton Harbor.

"One of the gratifying features of the new social center plan as adopted at the West High School," Principal Maurice Ricker, of Des Moines, Ia., is quoted, "is the large percentage of adults taking advantage of the meetings." This center tried one multiple-reel educational picture at each meeting, but is better pleased with one single-reel educational and two good, clean comedies.

A site has been purchased at Little Sioux, Ia., by Charles McAdan, D. South and James Gleason, who will erect an opera house.

Al Radabaugh has sold the Palace Theater, at Hartford City, Ind., which he operated for years, to A. A. Bowman, who has re-opened the place after remodeling it. Radabaugh will engage in the picture business elsewhere.

The American Theater, at Davenport, Ia., which has been playing vaudeville and tabloid musical comedy, will soon house a stock company.

The management of the Palace Theater, at Burlington, Ia., gave a private exhibition of "Absinthe" before it was shown to the patrons of the house, the papers of that city having stated that the film was barred by the Chicago censors.

B. Eugene Newmann, moving picture man, and Miss Myra Dietz, who posed in some of the pictures exploiting her father, John F. Dietz, the defender of Cameron Dam and later lecturer in many photoplay houses in the middle west, announced their approaching marriage to take place in Neenah, Wis., February 25.

FROM SAVAGES TO CIVILIZATION

Uncle Sam's uplift movement. "Baseball the forerunner of progress."

6500 feet of unsurpassed action

Filmed by Mr. Chas. Martin, the Government Photographer, under direction of the Hon. Dean C. Worcester, for fifteen years Secretary of the Interior of the Philippines.

These marvelous pictures (impossible of duplication) have been exhibited before the following:

National Geographical Society, Washington, D. C.
Princeton University.
Yale University.
City Club, Boston.
Association of Commerce, Chicago.

The New York World said: "The most wonderful motion pictures ever witnessed in New York City."

THE GREATEST PICTURE OF THE HOUR! OF VITAL INTEREST TO EVERY VOTER IN THE UNITED STATES

Shall the hundreds of millions of dollars spent in the Philippines and the result of years of development be turned over to our "Little Brown Brothers" or retained by the United States?
This question is going to be asked of every voter in America.
What do you know? How shall you decide? It is up to the picture to tell you.

Japan conquered Formosa, and is now spending millions to exterminate the people that it could not control.

W. Cameron Forbes, late Governor General of the Islands, asks the American people: "Shall we make a second Mexico of the Philippines?"

Only in the Philippines has the Christian Missionary converted a race of people—seven million souls, who hold the same religious belief as Americans.

GREATEST FIRE SCENE EVER SHOWN IN A FILM

The great fire on board the ocean liner is unquestionably the greatest spectacle ever produced before the camera. It shows the hold of a colossal ship, with its rows of boilers and men stripped to the waist, firing. Then comes the crash—the waters rush in—the boilers explode—the boat is one blaze of raging fire. The ensuing scenes are beyond description, as men plunge into the maelstrom of death to rescue their fellows, while on deck the officers battle with the frenzied passengers.

hold in the financial world. His desire for wealth is unsatiable, and he sacrifices everything a man should prize---his family, friends, self-respect --- on the altar of the MONEY GOD.

A SENSIBLE FILM FOR INTELLIGENT PEOPLE

The public has been satiated with tawdry sensationalism. "The Money God" presents the mooted question: "Do riches bring happiness?" in a forceful manner, giving an audience not only a dramatic treat in the superb acting of the characters and satisfying the demand of those who require sensationalism, but also appeals to the thinking minds. It will create much comment and discussion. It is a different film, dealing with a serious subject and will live forever in the memories of those seeing it.

Musical Movies Score Big Success at the Alhambra

New Departure to Take Broadway's Musical Comedies to Smallest Towns of Country.

An innovation in theatricals, the Renfax Musical Motion Pictures, scored both a popular and artistic success at the Alhambra Theatre last week, when they were presented for the first time.

These pictures mark an important departure in theatricals, as they are the first to present musical comedy on the screen and act, sing and talk delightfully as well. Not only are the voices made almost human through a new kind of singing machine known as the Renphone, but they are exquisitely blended with the action. The comedy in the pictures, too, is uproariously funny.

Weekly service as low as $15.

TO PRODUCERS OF HIGH GRADE FILMS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD:-

The undersigned Company which has recently acquired the World Special Films Corporation and the Pompeii Film Company, Inc., with seventeen (17) branch offices in the principal cities of the United States, is now opening additional offices in the leading centres of the United States and Canada.

The aim of the new Company, whose capital has been largely increased for that purpose, is to buy for cash, negatives, world rights, or will buy a minimum of twenty-two (22) prints of each subject with sole rights for the United States and Canada but only special features of four (4) reels or more will be considered.

The new Company wishes to supply the exhibitors with only the best that money can buy in this country and Europe, and no production will be too large to be handled if considered worthy to be sent out under our trade-mark and name.

We respectfully solicit from all manufacturers of high class features subjects sent for inspection which will have careful and prompt attention, as we are in a position to market quickly any production acceptable, not only in America but also Europe.

VITAGRAPH.

BUFFALO JIM (March 2).—In Nashby's saloon, crowded with cowboys and ranchmen, Buffalo Jim, with Tim, his friend, is seated at a table playing cards, when Steve Moffat, gun-fighter and bully of the town, comes noisily in, firing his revolver. The crowd promptly scatters, some diving under tables, and others making for the door. Steve laughs boisterously. Jim, while not frightened, keeps quiet.

Jim invites his sweetheart, Grace Hawes, to a big dance at Nashby's. In the midst of the dancing everybody suddenly stops as Steve, the terror of the camp, comes in. Grace, however, looks admiringly at big Steve, and starts a flirtation. Steves goes up to her and demands that she dance with him. Jim interferes, but the girl coolly turns with a smile to Steve, who orders the musician to resume, emphasizing it with a shot over their heads. Steve escorts the girl home, much to poor Jim's chagrin. She flirts with Steve and he tries to kiss her. Buffalo Jim, being sincerely in love with the girl, follows them, raging with jealousy. His friend restrains him. Jim challenges Steve to a pistol duel in Nashby's back room, which is accepted. Grace is highly elated at the idea of two men fighting over her, and Jim then realizes her shallow nature. She excitedly follows the two men. By a clever ruse Jim is victorious and Steve is made to look ridiculous. He is jeered by the crowd and scorned by Grace, whose affections have again switched to Jim. He, however, is disgusted and ignores her.

The next day Jim and his friend start back to the ranch. Grace begs his forgiveness, which he refuses. Her pride hurt, she becomes angry, but her expression changes to grief and longing as Jim turns and waves a scornful farewell and she realizes he has gone forever.

THE SACRIFICE OF KATHLEEN (Special—2 parts—March 3).—The first friend that poor Nora, a slavey, ever has is Arthur Jordan, a struggling young playwright. From him she hears the first kind words ever spoken to her, and she is glad that such a kind, new boarder, has taken a room at the boarding house where she works. Contrary to the landlady's expressed wishes, Arthur lends Nora a book to read and tells her that he will defend her against her irate mistress if she scolds her. Nora is filled with gratitude toward him. When he finishes writing his play and takes it to the theatrical manager, only to be told that it cannot be produced, she tries to cheer him up.

One day, not long afterward, Nora receives a message to the effect that her brother has died and has left her five thousand dollars. Without letting Arthur know, she goes to the manager and makes an arrangement with him whereby he will take her five thousand dollars and produce Jordan's play. The play is put on and is an immediate success. Waldron, now prosperous, leaves the cheap boarding house for better lodgings in a more fashionable part of town. He does not realize that the heart of a poor little slavey is almost broken over his going away; nor that it is due to her that he is so prosperous.

Five years later, Arthur, now famous, hears Brandon, the theatrical manager, telling a friend the story of how "The Toilers," Arthur's first play, was produced. Deeply moved, Arthur returns to the old boarding house to seek out his benefactress. He finds the little slavey very ill. In her arms is the book which he gave her to read five years ago. When she recognizes him, a wave of joy envelops her. In a fatherly manner, Arthur fervently clasps the happy girl in his arms and whispers sweet and comforting words of love.

A PAIR OF FRAUDS (March 4).—Young and pretty, Margery Dean, companion to Mrs. Sawyer, a wealthy lady, chances to meet Jack Drislane, a young clerk. It is raining hard; she has not an umbrella; he secures one and escorts her home. He is duly impressed when she enters a large brownstone mansion, particularly as the girl does not enlighten him as to her real social position. Later, they see each other again in passing autos and then Jack, who has been unable to forget Margery, asks permission to call, neglecting to mention, however, that he is a working man and not a wealthy idler. Margery is interested in Jack and does not wish to confess her fraud. They arrange to meet at a fashionable tea room, she pleading as her excuse for not permitting him to call, a very strict mother. Jack has to pretend he has a bad toothache, to get away from work. They meet as arranged and spend a delightful time in each other's company. She pretends to Jack that her mother wants her to marry a titled foreigner and must say farewell to him. He is heartbroken, but makes a brave pretense to her that he is sailing on the morrow aboard the "Thuric" for Paris.

On the following day, she goes to see him off. She bids him goodbye and the two are so absorbed in each other that they fail to heed the warning bells and cry, "All ashore." Margery barely has time to get off the boat. Poor Jack, however, not wishing Margery to see him leave the boat, is left on the steamer without money or ticket. Fortunately by chance he is offered a position as valet, which he accepts. Two weeks later, Mrs. Sawyer sails for Paris with Margery. While in Paris Margery chances to meet Jack. They accidentally discover each other's deceptions, confess and forgive. Jack asks her to marry him and they spend their honeymoon on a steamer bound for America. It is plain to be seen that there is no deception in their happiness.

SILENT TRAILS (March 5).—While riding quietly along the silent trails of the wild, open range, Jim Faulkner, a cowboy, is reminded constantly of his former sweetheart and lost love. He takes her picture from his pocket and looking longingly at it, the words of a poem he once heard come to him:

"I miss the silvery jingle of your spur,
I heard when you were riding by my side,
And when I think of you, a sudden blur gets in my eyes and blinds me as I ride."

The lonely man is nearly overcome with emotion and tries hard to keep back the tears. He sees a vision of himself riding with the girl along those very trails, sometimes by his side and again dashing ahead of him. He sees the Manzanita berries and remembers how he compared them to the roses in her cheeks. He imagines he hears her voice. At night he pictures, in a vision, her face in the starlit heavens, smiling at him. Again, she is pointing out to him the wonderful panorama of the range, the beauties of which he had never realized before, and sees a crowd of cowboys joking and "joshing" him about being in love. The vision of sweet memories occur and recur. As they fade, he sadly realizes he must follow the Silent Trails alone.

THE SPEEDER'S REVENGE (March 6).—A party of automobilists are held up by a couple of village constables for exceeding the speed limit through their town. They are taken to the local Justice of the Peace and fined $50. The party is very angry and sore at their treatment and after leaving the judge's office determine upon revenge. Passing a cornfield in their machine, Fred James, one of the party, sees a scarecrow. He gets an idea, tells the others. They take the scarecrow, stuff it with cornstalks, secure a bottle of red ink and a long-bladed knife, and prepare to convince the town that a terrible murder has been committed, and the remains of the victim disposed of. Hiding their auto in an isolated barn, they dip the knife in the ink, drag the "body" along the road, spilling ink along the way, finally throwing it down an old well. One of the residents sees the tell-tale signs and alarms the village. An excited crowd gathers and, with the constables and Justice of the Peace in the lead, aided by "bloodhounds," they follow the trail. They arrest a tramp and take him along as a suspect.

Meanwhile the automobile party have secreted themselves near the old well, and when the constables finally fish up the stuffed scarecrow from the well, burst into laughter. The speeders then quickly take their departure, and the villagers, seeing them, follow in hot pursuit. They are soon outdistanced, however, and the autoists doubly enjoy the joke on the discomfited townspeople as they wave them a parting farewell.

AN OFFICER AND A GENTLEMAN (Special—2 parts—March 7).—The Colonel's wife, Mrs. Cavendish, has an extravagant interest in Billy Brinkley, an army lieutenant, the hero of the army and navy game. When he is assigned to the Colonel's command, her attentions to him are noted and reproved by her husband, who fears gossip. Billy is in love with her sister, Joy Grayson, whom Captain Sutherland also wishes to marry, although he is carrying on a clandestine affair with the Sergeant's wife, Jane Smedley. His presents to Jane are discovered by the Sergeant and she defiantly acknowledges them. Billy and Joy's engagement arouses the jealousy of both Mrs. Cavendish and Sutherland. At a card party, Sutherland's bad feeling toward Billy crops out and they are only prevented from conflict by the other men present. Billy returns to his quarters to find Mrs. Cavendish awaiting him there. She pleads that she can't give him up to her sister. Billy quiets her and insists upon showing her home. Smedley goes to Sutherland and the same night to beg him to cease his dishonorable attentions to Jane. Sutherland replies insultingly. They quarrel. Sutherland springs upon Smedley.

In the struggle between Sutherland and Smedley, Smedley stabs Sutherland, killing him. The murder is discovered at once, Billy suspected and found absent from his quarters. Confronted upon his return, he realizes that he cannot prove an alibi without compromising the Colonel's wife. He is arrested by the civil authorities and at the Central Criminal Court the evidence is strongly against him. Mrs. Cavendish finally breaks down and confesses to her husband that she was the woman with Billy. He demands a public confession from her, in court, to clear Billy. As she is about to confess to the court, Smedley, conscience-stricken, rushes in ahead of her and admits that he killed Sutherland. Billy is accordingly exonerated, and he and Joy are united. Mrs. Cavendish's good name is preserved and Smedley receives his just punishment.

BIOGRAPH.

CHOCOLATE DYNAMITE (Feb. 28).—The night May's mother is indisposed tramps break into the store. May settles them with dynamite—no explosion, but quite as effective.

BECAUSE OF A HAT (Feb. 28).—Skelley buys a seat in the orchestra and determines to get his money's worth. No use. Mrs. Van Snoozeheim refused to remove her big hat. But it came off. Skelley did it. That started something with Mrs. Van Snoozeheim's escort. Over the stage they fought, and into the Rathbone cafe, and into Higgin's saloon. He took them over to his arena. There were two rounds to the finish.

HER FATHER'S SILENT PARTNER (Feb. 23).—After his daughter's return the jeweler attempted to break the partnership he had with the crook. His partner, however, won the girl's love, and threatened to expose the father if he attempted to break off the match. By a clever ruse the father set the gangsters against their leader. His plan did not prove altogether successful.

THE CHEST OF FORTUNE (Special—2 parts—March 2).—Hard pressed by the Federal troops, Morgan and his men flee across the bridge. Just before the pursuers come in sight one of Morgan's telegraphers taps the telegraph wires suspended underneath the bridge and learns that a quantity of supplies is being sent to Captain Wellington, of the Union forces. The Confederate leader places powder along the length of the bridge. The Federals come into view. Just as they are about to cross, the structure is blown skyward. Baffled, the Union soldiers are compelled to withdraw. Wellington receives the supplies and orders them stored in the cellar of his home. He and his wife are in the drawing room admiring a daguerreotype showing them seated with their four-year-old son, Jack, when a servant announces the approach of the raiders. The Captain hastily gathers together his silverware, which he places in a chest. Obeying an impulse, he throws the daguerreotype into the chest. Turning to two faithful old negro servants, he orders them to conduct Mrs. Wellington, Jack and the chest to safety. Shortly afterward the Captain is slain. A bullet strikes his wife and she shares his fate. Lugging the chest, the two servants hurry down to the river, with Jack tagging behind. The three tumble into a rowboat and head for midstream. Their flight is discovered by the raiders. A bullet kills the old mammy. To lighten the craft, the other servant throws the chest overboard. The next moment he is struck by a bullet and topples into the water. The rowboat drifts down stream, finally grounding near the landing of Stokes, a fisherman. Ward, a banker, is talking to Stokes at the time. They discover the boat and in it Jack, weeping bitterly over the body of his old mammy. Kate, the three-year-old daughter of the banker, places her little arms about the sobbing boy.

Years pass. Jack, grown to manhood, becomes a civil engineer and is in charge of the dredging operations on the very river down which he drifted to safety. Although adopted by Stokes and his wife, Jack and Kate have practically grown up together. Their childhood affection has turned into love. Harry Memling, in Ward's employ, is also in love with Kate, but the girl turns a deaf ear to his avowals. Later, Jack asks Ward for his daughter's hand, but the banker gravely tells him that the marriage cannot take place because he fears that the mulatto woman found dead in the rowboat may have been Jack's mother. The following day the dredge brings up an old chest from the river bottom. An examination of its contents brings to light the old daguerreotype. In the picture of the child Jack recognizes himself. Hastening to Ward, he tells of his find. Faced by the prospect of losing Kate, Memling is filled with murderous rage. That same afternoon he knocks Jack unconscious while aboard the dredge and places him in the bucket, which he then lowers into the river. The dastardly act is witnessed, however, and Jack is rescued. Kate and her father learn of the terrible deed and hasten to the vessel. While Jack is revived by his sweetheart Memling is led away under arrest.

THE INTRIGUE (Special—2 parts—March 4).—The Austins mourn the loss of their only child who has just died. At the same time, Brant, a young widower, comes to the city in which the Austins live. He brings with him his four-year-old son, Bob. The child wanders away from his father and later climbs into Mrs. Austin's automobile. He is discovered by the grief-stricken woman. In an insane moment, she determines to keep Bob. The protests of her husband are of no avail. Mrs.

FLORENCE TURNER IN GREAT MYSTERY DRAMA

Our Motto: If it's worth buying, we have it!

Austin finds a tintype of Bob and his father in the lad's pocket. This she carefully conceals. Brant distractedly searches for his boy, but in vain. Years later, Bob, grown to manhood, learns that the Austins are not his parents. His adopted mother shows him the tintype and tearfully tells why she was led to adopt him. Brant, meanwhile, has attained prominence as a lawyer. He falls in love with Jeannette, a society girl, and marries her.

As time passes, Brant neglects his young wife for his business. Fate throws Jeannette and Bob together. The boy falls in love with Jeannette. He urges the woman to elope with him. Lonely, and believing that her husband no longer loves her, Jeannette consents. On the night of the elopement Jeannette writes Brant a note, telling of her step. An impulse causes her to take an old tintype from a drawer. Bob sees it. It is identical to the one in his possession. The realization that he was on the verge of betraying his own father dawns upon him with crushing force. After ordering Jeannette to remove her wraps, the boy hastens to his adopted parents and tells them he has found his father. Brant, in the meantime, returns and finds the note, which Jeannette has forgotten to destroy. In the midst of his agony Bob and the Austins enter. Jeannette tells the reason which caused her to contemplate eloping. His joy in finding his long-lost son is so great, that Brant nobly forgives the culprits and takes them in his arms.

HIRAM'S HOTEL (March 6).—Hiram and Maria stop at a big hotel in the city. From the moment they arrive they are confronted by outstretched palms and compelled to tip every waiter, bellboy and porter in the house. Even a cabaret dancer, whose work captivates Hiram, places her open hand under his nose.

In disgust Hiram and his wife decide to return to their room. Hiram makes a mistake, however, and finds himself in the room of an old maid who is performing her toilet. Maria enters what she supposes is their room and confronts a young man in rather scanty attire. The country people decide that the city is no place for them and return home.

A week later, Blane, the manager of the hotel, finds himself stranded in front of Hiram's house when his automobile breaks down. He decides to stop at the farmhouse over night. He is recognized by Hiram and Maria. The two determine to give Blane a taste of what they experienced at his hotel.

Blane finds himself up against a tipping system that has his own beaten forty ways. He tips the hired girl, chore-boy, Hiram, Maria, hired hands and then is compelled to repeat the performance. To cap the climax, Maria and Hiram do a cabaret act, for which the amazed Blane has to pay liberally.

The following morning Blane asks for his bill and is staggered at the amount demanded. He learns his lesson, however. Hastening back to the city, he lowers his rates and abolishes the tipping system in his hotel.

BEAUTY, THE EDUCATED HORSE (March 6).—Beauty, a horse owned by a California girl, is beyond doubt one of the most remarkable animals in the world. Scientists who have witnessed Beauty perform, are unanimous in declaring that the animal possesses intelligence that is almost human.

This feature shows Beauty going through his paces. At the command of his mistress, the horse fetches objects some distance away, shows how scouts pursue a trail, and performs other amazing feats.

THE HOPI RAIDERS (March 7).—Anna is cruelly treated by Jepson, her father, who is the leader of a gang of whiskey traders. The girl is compelled to accompany the gang upon one of their trips to the Hopi reservation. The commandant of the post learns of the gang's activities. Captain Clark and a body of soldiers are sent to break up the traffic. The troopers come upon Jepson and his men. The criminals are beaten after a desperate battle, and their wagon load of whiskey blown up. Anna begs Clark to take her to the fort, where she will be free from her father's cruelty. Jepson's gang and the Hopis plan revenge. By a clever ruse, Captain Clark and his men are sent on a wild goose chase. That evening, Jepson drives into the fort with a wagon ladened with casks, declaring that he wishes to surrender. Later, Anna learns that this is part of a devilish plot to massacre the depleted force at the post. Stealing away, she hastens after Clark and his men.

At a signal the Hopis emerge from the casks, in which they have been hiding. Throwing open the gates of the stockade, they admit a force waiting outside. A terrific battle takes place. The commandant and his men are penned in one of the buildings. The criminals set fire to the house. Clark and his troopers return in the nick of time. A hand-to-hand fight ensues. The whiskey traders and Hopis are slain to the last man.

UNVEILING THE MAINE MONUMENT (March 7).—Amidst impressive ceremonies and in the presence of hundreds of thousands of people, a superb monument dedicated to the heroes sent to destruction when the "U. S. S. Maine" was blown up in Havana Harbor, February, 1898, was recently unveiled at Central Park, New York City.

This extraordinary feature gives a splendid view of the proceedings, which included a parade in which the Army and Navy participated and the unveiling of the beautiful monument. It will hold the interest of the photoplay patrons from beginning to end.

LUBIN.

THAT TERRIBLE KID (March 3).—Bob Hilton and Joe Sloan are pals until Mabel Bard, a new boarder, arrives and both fall in love with her. To hold Joe from keeping an appointment with Mabel, Bob tosses Joe's trousers to the landlady's baby, whose joy is to hold on to anything it gets its hands on. Joe attempts to take the trousers from the kid, but it puts up a terrible wail, and Joe is forced to miss his date. Later the girl promises to marry the one who arrives at the church first with the license. While the boys are dressing for the wedding, a friend switches the licenses. Joe, thinking he has Bob's license, tosses it to the kid, while he dashes off to the church. When Bob is dressed he finds the kid eating what he thinks is his license. Unable to get the paper away he picks up the kid and dashes out. The mother mistakes Bob for a kidnapper and yells for the police. Bob hops into an auto, the cops give chase in another machine. Bob dashes over a railroad track just in time to avoid missing a train, but the cops' car gets held up. Joe has arrived at the church and finds that he has the wrong license. He faints. Bob arrives with the kid and finds his license is safe. He tosses the kid to Joe and sends him out. The mother gets her baby and has Joe arrested as a kidnapper, while Bob and Mabel are married.

THE BEST MAN (March 3).—Helen Gray is in love with George Darcy. Her father wants her to marry Algy Pinkum, a mollycoddle. Algy overhears Helen and George plan to elope. He rushes to Helen's father with the news. Dad tells Algy to call at eight o'clock prepared to marry Helen. Helen informs George of this. That night while George is on the way to the Gray home with a friend they meet Algy and pounce on him. They bind him and throw him under a fallen tree. Father, while waiting to intercept the elopers, falls asleep. George and Helen get away in the friend's racing car. A burglar gets into the house, puts on father's clothes, poses as the owner and has father arrested as a burglar. Algy gets arrested for disturbing the peace. The elopers get arrested for speeding. The real burglar is arrested just as he is making a getaway. All meet at the jail and father pays all the fines but Algy's. George and

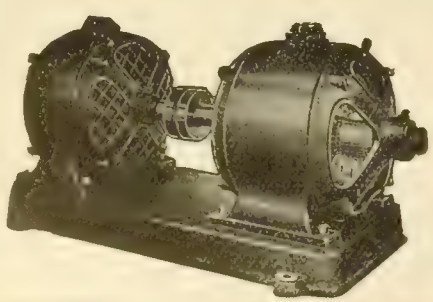
Something About Moving Picture Machines

Remember that after you have provided a good source of direct current at the arc with the "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. ECONOMIZER, your next move should be to throw out your old, out-of-date moving picture machines. Let your operator have a real chance to produce a perfect picture on your screen. What is the use of paying big money for film service and then spoiling the picture with an old rattle trap of a machine? What is the use of putting in big Economizers, producing powerful light, when your old M. P. arc lamp cannot take care of the powerful current and brilliant light? I AM DISTRIBUTOR of the POWER'S 6-A CAMERAGRAPH, SIMPLEX PROJECTOR, THE MOTIOGRAPH and the EDISON KINETOSCOPE. I have the right prices on any of the above and make a liberal allowance in trade for your old machines; but you must state in your first letter the make of your machine, the serial number and the model, and whether you want the new machine with lenses and rheostat and with motor drive. Also specify the current you are using, the make of current saver if you have one, the distance from lens to screen and the size of your picture. I will then make you an exchange proposition which will open your eyes. Your harvest season is coming on. Reap your profits now by installing new machines and ECONOMIZERS—IF YOU DON'T YOUR COMPETITOR WILL, and you will suffer in the long run.



HALLBERG A. C. & D. C. ECONOMIZER FOR ONE OR TWO LAMPS.

IN THE GAMBLER'S WEB (Special—2 parts—March 5.—Anna Gerard and Gaston Reyo maintain an apartment which is in reality a gambling den. Reyo meets John Dixon, a young business man, engaged to Edith Graham, and takes him to visit Anna, who poses as his sister. Cards are produced and John, of course, loses. As Anna, pretending sympathy, stands behind John, she manages to let Reyo know just what cards the stranger holds. John comes once more and then, tiring of the whole affair, vows never to visit Reyo again. Anna writes him a note, pleading that she wants to see him on a little affair of business. John calls, but when she clings to him, pleading her love, he grasps his overcoat and hastily rushes away. As he does so he drops his wallet. Anna picks it up and when Reyo comes in, he finds her counting the money. They plan to get away at once, but in the dividing of the spoils a quarrel arises, during which Anna is killed. John misses his wallet and returns for it. He bends over the dead woman and tries vainly to awaken her, when her maid enters. The girl's screams bring all the people of the house into the room and John is taken into custody. Reyo, who pretends to have been asleep, is found in the next room. During his trial Edith alone stands by her lover. He is sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. Edith still believes in his innocence and while John is in jail she plans and plots with his old servant, trying to find some way to aid his escape. John manages to escape from prison, and Edith waits for him at the edge of the woods with a motor car. In the limousine he effects a change of clothes. Then they go on toward the city, filled with hopes that they can find Reyo, whom they feel is guilty of Anna's murder. John, disguised, haunts all the cheaper cafes in the lower part of town and finally runs across Reyo, now an absinthe fiend. He then rents Anna's old apartment and sets to work with Edith's help to make the place look as much as possible like it did in Anna's time. Reyo often sees the young stranger hanging about the back rooms of the saloons. One day John invites Reyo to drink with him and suggests they have a game of cards. Reyo is an easy winner, just as John had intended. When the game is at its height, John must go, but suggests Reyo meet him at his apartment that night. Dixon hands him a card and the well remembered address of Anna's old home startles Reyo. John gives him a key and bids him to go right in if he happens to get there first. That night, Reyo, key in hand, passes the house, wondering if he dare go in. His need of money gets the best of him and with shaking fingers he lets himself into the old house. As he staggers into the dimly lighted place, he pauses at the table to strike a match. He looks down to see the body of a woman dead, across the table. It is "Anna!" He shrinks away. As he lifts her arm it falls back heavily, but not before he has seen the wallet clasped tightly in her fingers. He cannot awaken her—she is dead—just as he remembered her, with a bullet hole in her white forehead. Falling to his knees he shrieks out his guilt, protesting that he had not meant to kill her. At this two detectives come out from behind the portieres and take him into custody. He is led away, screaming and shuddering in terror. The carefully thought out plot has been successful. John is congratulated by and congratulates the actress he had hired to play "Anna." The next day the papers are filled with Reyo's confession and John Dixon, his name cleared, is free to claim the girl he loves.

HIS WIFE (Special—2 parts—March 4).—Young Dan Talfourd and Lucy Winter are sweethearts. Old Talfourd and Dan quarrel over their stenographer, Anna, because of the manner in which she seems to boss the elder man. The latter tells Dan that the matter must not be spoken of again. He is stricken and taken home mortally ill. Dan goes home and his father makes a dying confession. He tells Dan that Anna is his sister, an illegitimate daughter by another woman. Dan is compelled to promise his father that he will take care of Anna. Anna and Dan swear to keep the matter a secret. Lucy, suspicious of the intimacy that seems to exit, tells Dan he must discharge Anna. Dan cannot do this and the engagement is broken.

Later at a masked ball, Dan goes as Faust, Lucy as Marguerite and Anna as Carmen. Nobody knows who any one else is, so that when some of the maskers think that it would be great fun to hold a carnival mock marriage, with Faust and Marguerite for the principals, they are seized and placed before another masker attired as a Lord Chief Justice. All three principals try to back out, but the fun makers will have nothing else, and they go through the ceremony with carnival spirit. At the unmasking Dan and Lucy are deeply angered to find that they were the figures in the ceremony and though Dan is agreeable to forget their quarrel, Lucy will not have it. Anna, who has unmasked with the rest, but not as yet been seen by either Dan and Lucy, goes after him and tries to cheer him up. Lucy at that moment also seeks Dan, having changed her mind, but seeing Anna there in an attitude of familiar friendship, she cuts him completely and accepts the attention of an old admirer, Dave Bennett.

The next day Mowbray, the man who had masked as the Lord Chief Justice, comes to Dan and shows him that the ceremony was valid, as that day he had been ordained a minister, but not opening his mail, did not know about it until after he returned home. Anna has overheard the conversation and is pleased at the double hold he now has over Dan. Dan tries to regain Lucy's affections, but finds Bennett always with her. Lucy, jealous and angry, sees Anna with an unscrupulous chap named Dawson, who is taking her into a cafe of ill repute, so when she meets Dan a short time after he tells him about it, thinking to break down his seeming infatuation. Dan leaves her and goes in search of Anna. He finds them in the cafe, where Dawson is trying to get her to drink. There is a fight when Dawson resents Dan's interference. Lucy reads of the brawl in the papers the next day and her anger toward Dan deepens to such an extent that she accepts Bennett. Dan is about to tell her about the validity of the marriage when he realizes that she must care more for Bennett than she does for him. She tells him she does and on the day set for the wedding Dan decides to shoot himself at the hour of the ceremony, so that the way will be clear for her to be happy. Anna with the paper Mowbray signed breaks in upon the ceremony and makes clear Lucy's position. Lucy, overjoyed, hastens with Anna to Dan's home, where they are just in time to save him from pulling the trigger. Anna now happy, leaves them in each other's arms.

A ROMANCE OF THE NORTHWEST (March 6).—Jules LeFevre, a young French-Canadian trapper, is in love with Alice, the factor's daughter. Alice admires Jules, but does not give her consent to the marriage. At this point Dick Phillips, a corporal of the Northwest Mounted Police, is sent to Caribou to establish a barracks. He and Alice become interested in each other and this interest soon ripens into love. Jules is too much of a man to entertain animosity against his rival.

Bob Green, Alice's father, has a passion for gambling. In a game of cards with Dan Marks, gambler and bad man, Green is fleeced of all his own money. Desperate, he takes a large sum of money belonging to the Hudson Bay Company and loses that also. Too late he discovers that he has been tricked. In the dispute that follows Marks uses his revolver, wounding Green in the arm, and then makes his escape to the river bank. There he shoves off all the canoes but the one he himself is using, thus checking pursuit. Alice, agonized over the plight of her father, appeals to Jules and Dick for aid, declaring she will marry the man who returns the money and saves her father from disgrace. Dick starts the chase on horseback, Jules goes for his canoe. Luckily, he finds the canoe which had been set adrift, lodged against the bank on the opposite side of the river. He swims the river and takes up the pursuit in his canoe. Jules overtakes the gambler and after an exciting battle in the water, overpowers him. Dick arrives to find his rival the victor. Jules, however, seeing that Alice loves only Dick, gives up his claim on the girl,

WHEN DOOLEY PASSED AWAY (March 7).—The widow Cassidy is vigorously courted by Patrick Dooley and Michael Casey. They both love her truly, but the widow really sets her cap for Dooley. At last Dooley proposes and is accepted. To celebrate the engagement the fortunate lover gets gloriously drunk and finally falls asleep. Casey conceives a scheme for revenge. He smears Dooley's face with ice, applies a liberal layer of talcum powder and calls the undertaker in to lay out the supposed cadaver. When the widow returns she finds Casey weeping over what she is led to believe is the corpse of her beloved Dooley. She goes into hysterics and Casey promptly makes love to her. Later while the widow and her board-

The undertaker calls to collect his bill and sees Dooley and the mourners dashing down the street. He joins in the chase, but Dooley being overtaken demonstrates that he is very much alive. Casey sneaks and the undertaker tells how he came to lay Dooley out. Casey is chased, overtaken and forced to pay the bill, while Dooley leads the happy widow to the church.

ESSANAY.

THE LONG COLD NIGHT (March 3).—John Mackey, a well-to-do farmer, is selfish and miserly and refuses to allow his wife and her father to help a poor relation, Mrs. Ruth Montgomery and her baby. Ruth leaves the warm farmhouse and goes back to her cold, cheerless abode, where she places all the available covering over the baby. That night was the coldest the village had ever known, and the next morning, a neighbor entering the house, finds the young mother dead—having succumbed to the cold—but the baby is alive. The neighbor carries the baby to Mrs. Mackey and she gladly welcomes it into her home, but her husband tells her that "either her father or the baby will have to go." The old man hears this and gladly sacrifices himself for the baby. The selfish man's awakening comes when he sees the old man leaving the only home he has, and running after him, begs him to come back, assuring him that the baby can remain, too.

PRESTO WILLIE—MAGICIAN (March 4).—Willie prevails upon his father to buy him a game called "New Magic Tricks." Father willingly presents his son with the game. That evening Willie takes a snooze in the big armchair and dreams—a magician walks calmly into the room, puts Willie wise to a few tricks, and with the knowledge thus gained Willie starts out to "start something," and a huge amount of fun follows. Everything Willie touches with his magic wand turns into life.

THE CONQUEST OF MAN (March 5).—Tom Frazier loses his position on account of his craving for liquor. Nora, his wife, pleads with Tex Eaton, the foreman of the ranch, to take her husband back. Frazier sees his wife leaving the cabin of the foreman, and immediately becomes suspicious. That night Frazier turns his wife out and, in his anger, overturns a lamp, which sets the house on fire. Herbert, his son, is soundly sleeping in the next room, and would have been burned to death if it had not been for the timely assistance of Eaton. Frazier comes to his senses and realizes that his wife had not only saved him his position, but through Eaton had saved the life of his son. Frazier promises to turn over a new leaf and the story ends pleasantly.

SOPHIE'S BIRTHDAY PARTY (March 7).—That it doesn't pay to be too suspicious, Sophie discovered to her sorrow. Slippery Slim, her husband, plans to surprise Sophie on her birthday by presenting her with a new piano, and to give a surprise party in honor of the event. Slim hands out invitations to a number of the villagers, but Sophie, suspicious of him, follows. The country school teacher meets her Waterloo when Sophie discovers her talking to her husband, and a battle ensues in which Sophie gains possession of the written invitation. Slim arrives at the railroad station and with the aid of two or three men load the piano onto the truck and takes it to his home. In trying to move the piano into the house, Slim accidentally slips and the heavy musical instrument falls on top of him. The next hour is a memorable one to Slim, and the funny complications that arise will bring forth screams of laughter from the onlookers. Poor Slim is finally rescued, but has to remain in bed throughout the party.

CHAINS OF BONDAGE (Special—2 parts—March 6).—After the death of his wife at the birth of a daughter, Richard Buckley, a man of wealth, leaves the surroundings, which being unbearable to him, have temporarily crazed him, intrusting to the care of his old nurse, Fanchette, the bringing up of his little baby girl, Nita. Sight of him is lost for a number of years. At last his heart's wounds are partially healed and a longing comes over him for a sight of the child he has never seen since a baby. But fate wills otherwise, and, on the eve of his departure for his home town, he is mortally stricken by a stroke of paralysis. Knowing that he is in a precarious condition, he summons a lawyer to take charge of his affairs. But here enters fate again. The lawyer, to Buckley's dismay, reveals his identity as that of Burton, a once-upon-a-time rival for the hand of the girl whom Buckley married. The vengeful spirit never left this man, and he, seeing Buckley unable to defend himself, tells his intentions of using the papers and money to his own advantage. The shock of this man's villainous intentions brings on a complete palaysis, and Burton, after gathering up all the clues to Buckley's identity, leaves. Later, Buckley, without means of telling who he is, and without funds, is sent to the State Institute for the Helpless, which happens to be in his home town.

Part two opens fifteen years later with Burton, who, having spent the money, has successfully palmed himself off as Buckley. Fanchette, the old nurse, feels that something is wrong, but now nearly totally blind, she is unable to prove what she fears. The girl, Nita, also feels a natural aversion to him, because the love which he bears toward her is unnatural. This she confides to Oliver, a young doctor and her sweetheart, who is in charge of the State Institute. Later, Buckley meets the girl, whom he is sure is his own daughter, and also sees the relations existing between his daughter and Burton. His mind is certain, but being a total paralytic, he is helpless to interfere. Again, at a later time, father, daughter and villain are brought together. The two men have a scene in which the villain, Burton, recognizes Buckley, and fearful lest something should happen, resolves that Buckley must be gotten rid of for good. He nearly succeeds in his attempt, but is overcome. Buckley, face to face with death, breaks the chains of bondage, and Burton, realizing the game is up, is seen no more. Buckley presents himself as the father, and on proof furnished by himself and Fanchette, the nurse, is taken to the arms of his loving daughter. The story ends with a pretty tableau, in which they are united.

EDISON.

MR. SNIFFKINS' WIDOW (Mar. 2).—It is proper that we should speak no ill of the dead; but the general sentiment of the men of the village was that the Widow Sniffkins carried it a little too far. In the first place, the late Sniffkins has been absent from this vale of sorrow for something over five years. Secondly, the widow was still young and vivacious.

However that may be, the widow's only response to the impassioned declarations of the swains who sought her in marriage was in the form of a panegyric upon the merits of the late Sniffkins. Hiram Brown was particularly vexed by this tendency on the part of the widow. What made it all the worse was that the widow's attitude caused a number of the other marriageable ladies about town to look askance on their would-be beaux.

The arrival of Miss Betty Darrow, the new school teacher, put an entirely new face on things. Singly and collectively, the men with one accord threw themselves at her feet. Hiram Brown was particularly attentive. Just when things seemed darkest, relief arrived in the shape of Betty's fiance. With thankful sighs of relief, the ladies hastened back to their fickle beaux. With a sigh of relief, the widow cast herself on the ample chest of Hiram Brown. Hiram, thrilled with the sense of his advantage, sternly commanded that a hideous chromo of the late Sniffkins should be removed from the parlor, and the chastened widow obeyed. Then they were married.

WITH THE EYES OF LOVE (March 3).—Alice Elgin acts as stenographer to an old deaf banker. To facilitate her work, she has taught her employer lip-reading, and has naturally become an adept at it herself. Ned, her employer's son, falls in love with her, to his father's entire satisfaction. But since the old gentleman has a keen sense of humor, he at first pretends to be greatly enraged. The butler overhears a part of the apparent quarrel between them.

That evening burglars break into the house and kill the old man with a heavy cane Ned has left in the study. On the circumstantial strength of the butler's testimony, Ned is arrested for murder. At the trial, things are going very badly for young Belton until Alice happens to see a man in the audience whispering to his neighbor. With unerring precision, she reads the words, "If they knew I killed him." The story ends in an ably sustained dramatic climax wherein the utterly bewildered burglar, jerked rudely from his supposed safety, is confronted with the fatal cane and confesses his guilt.

AN ABSENT-MINDED MOTHER (March 4).—Mr. Grayson's claim to greatness lay in his invention of a magic hair restorer. Mrs. Grayson was remarkable for nothing so much as for the curious manner in which her brain worked. She was never able to get her mind on whatever she happened to a doing. One morning, she took her small son, who was the pride and hope of the family, off on a shopping tour. After making a few purchases in a drug store, Mrs. Grayson opened her pocketbook and took out a roll of bills. Then she looked in the pocketbook again. Her money was gone! The excitement which intervened between the time that she made this horrifying discovery and the time that the drug clerk pointed out to her that she was still holding the money in her right hand, was so intense that Mrs. Grayson swept out of the store with never a thought about the baby. By the time she reached home, she had completely forgotten that she had taken the baby with her.

"THE CREAM OF THE EUROPEAN MARKET SELECTED FOR AMERICA"

Hence when she looked for the infant upon her return and found no trace of it about the house, she immediately jumped to the conclusion that it had been stolen. Hectic times followed. While Mr. and Mrs. Grayson tore frantically about town, the baby was found by one of the policemen who had been detailed to search for it. To keep it out of mischief until the family returned, the Grayson's maid placed the child in a large packing case. A considerable quantity of Mr. Grayson's wonderful tonic had been spilled in the packing case that very morning. When the child was restored to its mother's arms, it rejoiced in a mustache and beard that a man of forty might have envied. It was a great advertisement for the hair tonic, anyway.

A FOUR-FOOTED DESPERADO (March 4).—The story begins when a high-strung bear escapes from his keeper and sallies forth in search of adventure. He is an eminently respectable bear with nice manners, and when he comes upon two ladies conversing across the fence he taps one playfully with his paw, and she, misunderstanding the gleam of affection in his "gentle" eyes, flees in alarm, the bear's feelings are hurt. And the same lack of confidence on the part of the other human beings with whom he comes in contact is noticeable wherever he goes.

By the time he reaches the good ship "Sally R." the ridiculous behavior of people in general has spoiled his usual good temper, and he takes a melancholy delight in chasing the crew into the rigging. Then suddenly he comes upon the captain's daughter, a little girl of nine, sitting on deck with a big bowl of bread and milk. She tells the bear that he is a naughty big doggy to chase people, and feeds him bread and milk with a spoon, smacking him sharply with it when he becomes impatient.

COMEDY AND TRAGEDY (Special—2 parts—March 6).—A gentle smile played on the lips of Monseigneur le Prince Gautier de Severac. Inwardly he was debating on the relative merits of poison and the sword as a means of ridding himself of a rival, but Monseigneur le Prince had never been one to take the world into his confidence by allowing his expression to match his thoughts. He was very angry. It was an impossible position he had fallen into. He, a prince of the house of Savoy, had permitted himself to fall in love with a mere actress, and she, instead of praising Heaven for her astounding good fortune, preferred, if there was any truth in rumor, the captain of the Prince's bodyguard to his august self. To test the truth of the rumor, the Prince had lately sent this captain, Jaques Duval, with a note to the actress, and had commanded a faithful spy to dog Duval's heels and note his every action.

Monseigneur le Prince looked up as the spy entered.

"Well?"

At the reception of Mademoiselle Yvette Bordeaux, the Prince enjoyed himself extremely. It pleased him to order Duval about like a lackey in the presence of the woman they both loved. Yvette, who sensed Duval's danger, grew pale with fright. When at length the Prince conceived the brilliant plan of dispatching Duval to Yvette with a necklace, and following close on his officer's heels, Yvette saw his waiting figure outside the door. To save the life of the man she loved, Yvette turned coldly from Duval to the Prince, and begged him to fasten the necklace about her neck himself. He did so, and kissed her. Duval rushed from the room with heart turned to stone.

Later in the evening, the assembled company begged Mademoiselle Yvette to prove to them whether she was better in comedy or tragedy. Yvette, in compliance with their request, started to act a little scene of comedy. Just as she finished, a note was brought to her. It was from Duval, and said simply that he was to fight the Prince immediately, that the Prince would certainly kill him, and that he was glad to die. She staggered, nearly fell, and started blindly for the door. The company applauded, and pushed her back. She looked at them dully. "I must go to him, he is dead," she said simply.

"Ah!" cried the old actor, who had proposed the wager, "it is the very perfection of tragedy."

When Yvette at last reached the garden, a shrouded figure was lying on the ground. As she stumbled toward it, it seemed to her that light had left the world forever. She lifted the cloth from the face, and—it was the Prince. Then Duval came to her, and the stars came out again, and the moon shone.

WHEN THE CARTRIDGES FAILED (March 7).—The most unfortunate thing about modern civilization is the incontrovertible fact that it is only skin deep. A pleasant and necessary attribute of our ordinary well-fed lives, it is rapidly cast aside after a few days of hardship and necessity. Give a man twenty-one meals a week, and he will be a Chesterfield of Chesterfields; give him six, or possibly five, and he will divest himself first of his overcoat and then of civilization.

This was the trouble with Ed. Huggins. To be sure, he still had his twenty-one meals a week. In addition, he had a comfortable position with the Globe Construction Company. But both of these were overshadowed by the fact that he owed more money than he could ever possibly pay. When temptation presented itself in the shape of an opportunity to leave the country and his debts behind him, and to start life anew somewhere else with a good-sized bank account, it found him a ready listener.

Every Saturday, as Huggins knew, the Globe Construction Company sent $26,000 from its city office to pay the men out at "The Works" in East Belmont. This money was ordinarily taken by an armed messenger in an automobile and delivered to Bob Graham, the chief engineer at the Works. When the regular messenger fell ill, Eleanor Cooper, a stenographer at the city office, offered to take his place. After some thought, the president consented. Before she started, Eleanor was given a revolver. Only two cartridges could be found to put in it.

Huggins slipped out ahead of the girl and succeeded in making a slow leak in the tire of the automobile. Then he hurried out toward East Belmont on a street car. As he hoped, the tire gave out on a stretch of rough road in the woods, half a mile from the Works. Eleanor, knowing it was only a short distance, decided to walk. Shortly after she started, she was attacked by the desperate Huggins. Eleanor took refuge in a deserted shack. How the wily Huggins succeeded in making her fire the two precious shots, and exactly what part Billy and Bob Graham played in her rescue, we shall leave to this exciting film to explain.

PATHE.

THE SECOND GENERATION (Mar. 3).—Otto Reid as a young man, was told by his physician that he should not marry, owing to a taint of insanity that had been handed down to him by his father and grandfather. Regardless of the warning he has married, and at the time of the beginning of the play has a son, Hugo, about thirty years old. Hugo has fallen in love with a beautiful girl and become engaged to her. The family doctor repeats to the son the warning given the father years before, and more mindful of his duty than his father was, he goes to his fiancée and tells her that he has learned that it would not be wise for him to marry. Irene cannot understand and is terribly hurt at the broken engagement.

Driven by his loneliness, Hugo goes back to the company of Hazel Hamilton, whose influence upon his life had been the reverse of that of Irene. In her company he strives to forget, but in vain. In the meantime Irene spends her days in longing for her departed lover. One day Irene, while sitting with her embroidery on the bank of a beautiful river, sees drifting down the stream a canoe in which she recognizes Hugo with his head in Hazel's lap. Wounded at the sight, she runs back to the house, but not before she has been recognized by the young man. He pursues her to the house, and urged by his love, attempts to win her back. Coming to himself he tells all to her mother and leaves the house for good. Returning to his home he sees for the first time, the signs of the hereditary taint in his father, and is later himself carried away from the house mentally incurable.

HOGAN'S ALLEY (Mar. 4).—The O'Briens prepare for a Sunday afternoon stroll in the park, but the watchful eye of Mrs. O'Brien sees that the shirt of her spouse is not so immaculate as it once was and commands him to remove it, that she may wash it. This is done and the garment placed upon the line to dry. Now young O'Reilly joins in a game of marbles with O'Brien's youngest son, and before long they engage in a very energetic scrap. The sounds of battle reach the ears of the two families and in a moment they meet in the back yard where they find the newly washed shirt trampled in the dirt. O'Briens side with O'Briens and O'Reillys with O'Reillys. A policeman comes along just in time to prevent a general battle.

The next morning Michael stops at his front gate to pass a few words with his heart's desire, Maggie. The late feud has passed these two by and in the passage of honeyed nothings Michael tarries too long, with the result that he is late at the factory. O'Reilly, who is foreman, still angry over yesterday's fracas, will not admit the young man, but fires him. The next day Michael sees a chance to get even. He finds the cop on the beat asleep in the back room of a saloon, and taking the policeman's helmet and coat, parades as one of the finest before his admiring sweetheart. He tells his wondering relatives that he has got a job on the force and is asked by his father to arrest O'Reilly, who thrashed the youngest O'Brien for taking a pie which he found on the O'Reilly window sill. Michael does so, but seizes the opportunity to tell O'Reilly that he'll let him off on receiving permission to marry his daughter. The marriage is performed in a hurry, and none too soon, as the real cop comes along looking for trouble. But matters are finally patched up by the united families, who plead successfully for the honor of the family.

THE BROTHER COUNTS (Special—2 parts—Mar. 5).—Charles, the youngest son of Count Marrat, is a university student and is called back to his home at the beginning of the play by a telegram from his elder brother, to the effect that their father is dangerously ill. He sets off at once for his home, but arrives too late. The father has passed away with his last words admonishing Frederick to be a father to his younger brother. After a time the younger man wishes to see the world and Frederick gives his permission, asking the old family butler to go along with him to watch over him. In the course of his travels Charles meets Villier, who beneath the polished exterior of a man of the world hides a hard hart and utter lack of character. His sister, Florence, is his opposite and Charles immediately becomes much interested in her. Villier invites the young man to join them at cards that night, and forces his sister to take the part of an unwilling decoy.

That night Charles loses heavily and is continually egged on by Villier until his cash becomes exhausted and then the boy is persuaded to sign notes, which he stakes until all is gone. Realizing that he is ruined, he returns to his apartments, writes a note of farewell to his brother and then kills himself, his body being later found by the old butler. The death of his much loved brother following so closely upon the father's death so preys upon Frederick's spirits that his health is seriously affected and his physician recommends travel.

Traveling under an assumed name, Frederick meets by chance Florence Villier, who, disgusted with her brother's evil character, has left him for good. Charmed with her attractiveness, like his brother, he falls in love with her. With the passing weeks their love grows stronger and stronger, until finally the count proposes marriage and is accepted. Then, for the first time, he tells her his true name. In amazement Florence asks him if he had a brother, and then the whole miserable story comes out. Florence, who visits upon herself the guilt that should be placed on the shoulders of her brother only, flees, panic-stricken, from the man who brings back to her the victim of her flesh and blood.

Frederick pursues her and seizes her just in time to prevent her from throwing herself from a high bridge over a river. He calms her grief and tells her that she was not to blame, but that Charles' death lay upon the boy's own shoulders, and that he paid the penalty for his own folly. Thus they leave the dead past to bury its dead and vow to each other eternal fidelity and love.

ON THE ALTAR OF PATRIOTISM (Special—2 parts—Mar. 7).—Lieutenant Otto is fascinated with Eleanor, a beautiful dancer, who unites beauty of person with unusual grace. While he is engaged in a charming tête à tête with Eleanor in the embassay, of which he is the military attache, an important conference is going on among the embassay officials. It is decided that, in view of the present strained conditions existing between their country and the nation to which they are accredited, that it is necessary to obtain all the information possible concerning frontier fort No. 2, and that the work should be entrusted to Lieutenant Otto. A messenger is sent for him, interrupts him in his charming little party and brings him into the conference. His mission is made clear to him, an order for unlimited funds given him, and the means by which he is to obtain the information desired left to his judgment.

Having heard that the general who is the commander-in-chief of the fort in question is very susceptible to feminine flattery, the lieutenant determines to enlist the support of his beautiful country-woman, the dancer. He explains his plans to her and receives her hearty co-operation. They decide to put the plans into execution at a ball given by the commander-in-chief that very week, and to which they have received invitations. At the ball Eleanor seeks an introduction to the general and then sets out to fascinate him. She so far succeeds that the amorous officer asks her to come and dance for him at the fort some evening.

The lieutenant and Eleanor then adopt a perilous scheme. He drives her in his motor car, one evening to the general's house. From concealment they see him through a window working upon plans of the fortress and consider the time ripe for their attempt. Eleanor goes to the door, is admitted, and sends in the fan upon which the general wrote a few lines of invitation the night of the ball. The general is in a quandary. On the one hand he wishes to see his charmer, while on the other, he is reluctant to leave his blue prints. He finally yields to his inclinations and admits her to his apartments. While she is holding the commandant's attention in the dining room with her dancing, the lieutenant enters the officer's study and proceeds to copy the blue prints. His work done, he starts to leave, but his sleeve catches in a loaded pistol which is lying on the desk and it falls to the floor and is discharged.

In the next room the noise is of course heard and the general at once starts to rush for the study, in spite of the detaining efforts of the girl. He sees the figure vanishing from the balcony and fires after it. The girl escapes from the house, pursued by the general, but the motor car is waiting and she and the lieutenant speed away in it. The general at once rushes for the telephone and the frontier guard is warned. As the flying car approaches the boundary line it is fired upon by the soldiers. It passes in a shower of bullets, is pursued, but finally escapes across the frontier. Later, in the hospital, in the presence of several of the embassy corps and high officials, the lieutenant and the girl, mortally wounded in the escape, die as their grateful countrymen solemnly salute them for their heroic deed.

SELIG.

A SOLDIER OF THE C. S. A. (Feb. 13—Substituted in Place of "Their Lesson").—Uncle David Clayton, an old soldier, goes well with his old fiddle, and he makes a precarious living as an itinerant musician. He comes back to his humble abode after a day's wandering penniless and sinks discouraged into a chair. The big, coarse landlady enters and brusquely demands her rent. He protests he has no money, and in lieu of payment she snatches his only means of support—the fiddle. She indicates by threatening gestures that she is going to do more to him if money is not forthcoming at once, and exits growling in a fury.

He starts out bewildered and halts wearily in a park at the base of the staute of the revered Southern leader, Robert E. Lee. Presently he resumes his endless walk, and passes down the great boulevard lined with homes of wealth. The scene flashes to a dining-room in a home of wealth, where Captain Billy Henderson, a Confederate, is celebrating his birthday, and is surrounded by several old war-time comrades, all in uniform, the room being draped with the colors of the Confederacy. Uncle David observes the celebration through the window—his heart hungers for companionship, not to emphatically remark—food. The people leave the dining-room and Uncle David observes the viands through an open window. Pangs of hunger overcome those of conscience—he enters the room, picks up a loaf of bread, wraps it in a flag, and retreats through the window. The keen-eyed butler comes into the room at this moment, leaps through the window after him, captures the poor, old soldier and calls for the police. The commotion stirred up by this attracts the attention of the guests and they rush to the rescue. When they discover the cause of the trouble, Uncle David immediately becomes the hero of the hour. He is dined and wined, and becomes a member of the company. He details his war experiences that are shown in a series of "dissolves." The piano music apparently palls on the assembled company, and Captain Billy sends for Uncle David's violin, securing the treasure from the irate landlady, cashing his account and settling Uncle David comfortably for the remainder of his declining days.

THOU SHALT NOT KILL (Feb. 18).—The Knox-Waterton feud is reaching a bloody crisis in the far-away mountains, when Esther Hale, from a peaceful New England village, arrives upon the scene of the trouble and becomes an unconscious factor in a war that has raged over a quarter of a century. Brian Knox, who has the heritage of leadership, is at once struck by the simple beauty of the New England girl, and her spiritual vitality as a religious factor causes him to turn aside from vengeance and listen to her reading the Scriptures, particularly her frank interpretation of the Sixth Commandment: "Thou Shalt Not Kill."

Later, Brian, the last of his race, enlists in the army and Earl Waterton becomes a recruit in the same company. Attempt at desertion causes Earl to serve a two years' sentence in the military prison, and while working there on a rock pile, he is under the surveillance of Brian Knox, who gives him an opportunity to escape, with the hope that he may have the long-sought opportunity for killing him. This waited-for moment arrives, and as Brian throws his gun into range, catching the sight, his thoughts flash back to the green hills of Kentucky—to Esther Hale, and the big "six" she had him carve upon the old chestnut tree to remind him of the commandment she had taught him. He halts his man and frankly tells him he cannot kill him. He offers him his hand, and in the fervent clasp that follows, the Knox-Waterton feud ends forever.

THROUGH THE CENTURIES (Feb. 17).—Raymond Truxton and Amos Willing, two young American archaeologists, are on a scientific expedition in Egypt. On excavating an ancient tomb, they find sitting therein, in a state of suspended animation, a beautiful young woman, seemingly an Egyptian princess. They find a parchment lying by her side, confirming this fact and indicating that she has been buried 2,000 years. The manuscript recites, that in a former life, the girl was beloved of two priests—one she loved and one she hated: and it had as a prophetic codicil that after twenty centuries she would be unearthed by the reincarnated souls of her two lover priests.

This princess was buried alive concealed in the tomb at the instigation of Meloid, the vengeful priest, whom she hated, after he had accomplished the murder of Shumek, his rival. Meloid managed to secure the consent of King Sestoris on the basis that the woman had allowed herself to love a priest, which under the ancient Egyptian law meant death or burial under a hypnotic spell, which resulted in suspended animation. Then through their modern, scientific cunning, the Americans restore her to consciousness.

While pursuing this strange and solemn story, Truxton and Willing, erstwhile friends, now realize that they are the reincarnated suitors, and the latter, obsessed by the spirit of the vengeful Meloid, feels a most powerful desire to slay Truxton and seize the prize, but through the passage of the centuries, this troubled and scarified soul has been purified and strengthened for better things. He controls himself, gives up the girl and vanishes.

THE ATTIC ABOVE (Feb. 27).—The irregularities in the accounts of the First National Bank led President Hutchins to suspect there is a black sheep among his employees, so he engages detectives, and they inveigle the clerks into the private office, one by one, and give them the third degree until somebody "comes through." Officers are posted about the building to cut off the retreat of any person who seems to be attempting flight. Under pressure, the second clerk weakens and declares he saw Bates, the teller, forge a note. Bates, who has been listening at the door, endeavors to escape from the bank, but is nabbed by an officer in waiting and placed under arrest. His guilt is proven and his punishment follows.

Years later, after his release from jail, Bates plans revenge upon the bank president. Attired as a fashionable doctor, he visits Hutchins in his palatial home, and tells him a pathetic story of a sick widow whom he has found in an attic, attended only by her lone little girl. He produces a note, presumably written by the woman, appealing to Hutchins to come and see her before she dies, as she was a sweetheart of his boyhood days. The banker's interest is aroused and he agrees to be at the attic the next day at 2 o'clock. The ex-prison bird, with his tough gang, await his coming, highly elated over the prospects of capturing a man of money and securing a large ransom. Hutchins, however, has not been banking for nothing, and is a keen old chap, so, before starting, he advises his personal detective to meet him at the attic address at the hour named. Bates and his companion attack and bind the bank president and then shove a check book before him, telling him to sign for a large sum or they will abandon him to his fate. About this time the detectives break in, the gang is "pinched," old Hutchins is liberated, and leaves the place with a foxy smile upon his face.

TESTED BY FIRE (Feb. 26).—Hal Arnold, a forest ranger in one of the California mountain reserves, in going the rounds, frequently passes old man Carroll's cabin, where Betty, a typical Sierran lassie, is a most magnetic attraction. Arnold frequently leaves the trail at this point and rides up the hill and makes visits with the quaint old woodcutter and his fond daughter. Algernon Fordham, scion of a wealthy New York family, comes into the West on a mining trip and makes arrangements to board at the Carroll's. His style soon attracts the unsophisticated country girl, and for the nonce she turns from the wholesome son of nature toward the man of the world. Arnold, sensitive to a degree, feels the slight and stops his calls.

One day Betty and Algernon ride into the woods, and in spite of her warning the careless city man builds a fire to make their coffee, and then, without a woodsman's caution, fails to stamp it out. Soon after they ride away Betty notices smoke and gallops back, endeavoring to extinguish the treacherous flames. While they are dismounting, Fordham's horse escapes, and the flames, bursting out, strike terror into his heart, so that he yields to cowardice, leaps on Betty's horse and escapes, leaving Betty to a fiery fate. Arnold, who is going his rounds on an elevation above the canyon, sees the flames, rides in hot haste, and discovers Betty just as she falls, overcome, and carries her safely through the raging line of fire.

In the meantime, Carroll, warned by the arrival of the terrified Fordham, arouses the mountaineers, who forcibly drive Fordham before them back to the fire and make him work with the rest to extinguish it. Afterward, in disgrace, Fordham takes his shameful leave, surrounded by a silent group of mountaineers, who show their inherent big-heartedness by refraining from any final denunciation of the poltroon. But their countenances vividly suggest the abhorrence in which they hold cowardice. Betty is, of course, happy in the arms of her lover.

KING BABY'S BIRTHDAY (Feb. 25).—An o'er fond father and mother vie with each other in love and care of their wonderful first baby. Of course, when mother-in-law pays them a visit, she shows them how to take care of the baby and not ruin its health in the way they are likely to do; both are indignant. The nurse goes out and leaves the baby, and the mother immediately thinks it is ill because it is crying. The mother-in-law, however, knows differently and removes a safety pin from it anatomy.

Then the fond pair buy birthday presents for the baby—suitable for a child of ten years. Mother-in-law buys a simple rattle—the baby playing with it and discarding all the expensive presents, much to the astonishment of the father and mother. The mother-in-law next pays a visit to a seamstress, who has been doing the sewing for her daughter, Mrs. Howard, where she finds a large family of little ones mourning because they have no playthings. She afterwards sends for the seamstress and the children and has them brought to her son-in-law's house, and the father and mother give the baby's presents to the seamstress's children, and invite them to dinner. This is the crux of a lesson planted by a sensible, but too frequently cartooned mother-in-law.

THE CYNIC (Feb. 24).—A well-fed, well-dressed Cynic of the club holds that at heart every man is a thief. The Philosopher took exception to his premise and finally wagered the Cynic that from his intimate knowledge of humanity he could pick a man from the masses that would readily demonstrate his theory—that most men are honest. The two clubmen then stroll into a park. There on a bench they observe one of that melancholy class known as the "down and outer," and the Cynic consents that the Philosopher use him for a test. After some little talk he says to the bench sitter, Wall: "I need a man willing to take a desperate chance. You look to me like the man." Wall, the "down," is a trifle disconcerted at the selection, but being hungry, homeless and penniless, is not afraid of any desperate chance.

An hour later, in the presence of the Cynic, the Philosopher place a bundle of bank notes in an envelope, which he carefully seals, while being jeered by the Cynic for being a fool. At the latter's residence they arrange a brass jardiniere beneath a window, leaving the latter unlatched. Returning to his home, the Philosopher opens the sealed envelope, removes the lawful currency, and substitutes the same size of blank paper and a note, together with sealed instructions to Wall in another envelope. Wall keeps the appointment, and with a great show of secrecy and mystery is given the two envelopes. He opens the one containing instructions, and learns that the other is very valuable. Desperately hungry, he gazes in the window of a restaurant and fingers the valuable packet, but he hurries on, and, reaching the Cynic's residence, deposits the sealed envelope in the repository and then returns to his employer, the Philosopher. The Cynic, watching him, removes the packet from the jardiniere; then, in seeming proof of his own statement that every man is a thief, resolves to take the money himself and declare Wall the thief, thereby winning the wager. He opens the packet and is dismayed at its contents, finding a note, "I win." Signed, the Philosopher.

MEMORIES (Feb. 20).—In youth, Prof. Scott, now mature and eminent as a scientist, loved Mary Brown, a sweet country lass, but his stern father bitterly opposed the match because of the fancied inferiority of the girl, and forced the pair adrift. In despondency Mary sought the seclusion of the convent and took the veil. Scott's sorrow never quite forsook him, although he later married and raised a daughter of his own that was the very apple of his eye.

IT IS A CURIOUS FACT THAT IN EVERY CENTURY A CERTAIN MAN IS BORN WHO STANDS OUT IN HISTORY ABOVE THE COUNTLESS MILLIONS, BUT OVER ALL NAPOLEON PRESERVES A PERENNIAL FASCINATION FOR HIS FELLOW MEN. HIS IMPERIOUS PRESENCE DOMINATES THE HISTORY OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, NOT ONLY IN FRANCE, BUT IN THE WHOLE WORLD. A GENERAL CONSENSUS OF OPINION WOULD PROBABLY AGREE THAT HE WAS THE GREATEST MAN THAT EVER LIVED. ASSUREDLY HE WAS THE GREATEST SOLDIER. ONLY ALEXANDER AND CAESAR CAN BE MENTIONED IN THE SAME BREATH. HIS LIFE WAS OF SUCH A SENSATIONAL AND ROMANTIC NATURE THAT NOTHING IN MADE-TO-ORDER PLOTS CAN EQUAL IT.
HUGH HOFFMAN

It came about that Clyde Lawrence, a poor but worthy youth, fell in love with his daughter, Marjorie, and she reciprocated his affection. The young man sought her father to ask his permission for her hand in marriage, but the stern professor set his face against it, telling him that he would have to first make his way in the world. The grief of the youthful pair is bitter, and seems, all in all, a replica of the early lives of the professor and his old sweetheart, Mary. Marjorie, to assuage her grief, seeks refuge in religion and applies to a nearby convent for admission, just a quarter of a century after Mary, who is now Mother Superior, had passed through those same portals to forget the world. Gentle and chastened by years, she receives Marjorie and learning of her identity and then the reason of her unhappiness, her own past again sweeps before her—a sad dream. Bitterness has vanished from her life, but the memory moves her to sympathize with this young girl, and save her from an unnecessary sacrifice. She pens a note to Prof. Scott, asking him to call at the convent. In conformity with this request, he comes—they have an interview and she gives him back his daughter with the advice to remember their own past and be merciful. This makes a living memory for the stern professor. He relents and at once consents to allow Marjorie to marry the young man of her choice.

VENUS AND ADONIS (Feb. 19).—Venus is an attenuated "maiden lady" of uncertain years, and Adonis is a skinny old chap with whiskers. They spend their days of coy courtship on the beach, where they engage in the gentle pastime of allowing the waves to beat against their bones. They are such sights in their bathing suits that the whole summer colony rush away with laughter and give them the freedom of the beach. One day while in their airy attire, they quarrel, and Venus testily betakes herself to a rowboat, some distance down the beach, and settles down for a nap. Poor old shivering Adonis gazes admiringly at her from afar through an antiquated telescope.

Soon a band of boys, who have been playing "pirate," come along and tow Venus' boat to a rocky island some distance from shore, and maroon her. Foxy Adonis sees this movement and quickly secures another boat. The boys, however, have a weather eye for him, and when he lands they capture him at once, deprive him of his bathing suit and leave him only a barrel for protection. They then row to the mainland and inform the life-saving crew that two human beings are marooned on the lonely island. The crew make a dash for it. In the meantime, Venus strolling about the island, happens to meet Adonis, and finding that his only clothing is a barrel, is shocked enough to die on the spot. She is cruel to be coy and refuses to be saved in the same boat with her scandalous lover until she is carried aboard by main force.

MELIES—GENERAL.

WINKY WILLY'S ARITHMETIC (Feb. 26).—Winky Willy has a fit of laziness. He does not feel at all inclined to try to master the intricacies of a problem in arithmetic set him by his indulgent father. Why indeed should he go to all the mental stress involved in working out the sum total of so many pounds of groceries at so many cents per pound. A brilliant brain wave strikes him and we see the diminutive comedian in the grocery store. He presents the unadded bill to the grocer, stating that it represents a rush order. Willy insists that the bill be added correctly, and he returns in triumph to present the completed sum to his father's astonished gaze. Daddy is dumbfounded to see that his son has so cleverly worked out the problem, until the distracted maid appears, followed by almost the entire grocery store staff of clerks, who have come to deliver the "rush order." At first inclined to give Willy a whipping his father eventually sees the humor of the situation and forgives him.

BATTY BILL AND HIS PAL'S LEGACY (Feb. 26).—Sam Jones has a peculiar uncle, who bequeaths to Sam his historic mansion and all his fortune in securities and bonds. But the securities are hidden somewhere in the house. The uncle desiring to develop Sam's intelligence has thus concealed all the papers connected with his fortune. Sam calls in Batty Bill to his assistance, and Bill has been studying detective methods for some little time past; he feels fully competent to cope with the task of discovering the hidden documents. After many tragi-comical adventures, including an affray with bandits, who are also searching for the lost papers, a premature burial, etc., Batty Bill eventually discovers the papers quite by accident. He rushes to his friend's home and announces in triumphant tones, "Some detective, Sam Jones, eh? Here are your papers."

ECLAIR.

AT THE CROSSING (Feb. 1).—Judge Dikeman gives Mike and Jim a long sentence in jail. A short time later the judge's daughter leaves for a boarding school. Her father is an inveterate smoker, and is warned several times by his own physician that he must stop smoking. He cannot break the habit off, however, and just about this time Mike and Jim are released from jail. They decide to get even with the judge, and under cover of night make their way to the side entrance of his house. Just as the two jail-birds enter the judge is seized with an attack of heart failure.

The two house breakers enter the room and find it in total darkness; they discover they have cut the electric light wire instead of the telephone wire. They make out the shadowy form of the judge lying in his chair, and as one of them is about to smash him on the head with the black-jack, he sees how lifeless his body looks. Believing the judge to be dead, in a panic they rush for the door, but hear the daughter coming up the path. Seizing the judge's body they drag it behind a curtain and as she enters they manage to glide through the door, locking it on the outside. The girl, astonished at the darkness and the strange atmosphere, gropes about until she finds an oil lamp. She lights it, and is looking about the room when the judge's body falls forward, knocks the lamp over, and sets the room on fire. She rushes for the door, but it is locked.

Mike and Jim hear her screams. They hesitate a second—then dash back to the house. Opening the door, they carry first the girl and then the inanimate body of her father safely out. A doctor is summoned and after working over the apparently lifeless form of the judge finally brings him to life. Mike and Jim decide this is a good time to "beat it," and are about to leave when the door is thrown open and they walk into the arms of a policeman. He seizes them, but the judge says: "Don't lock them up; they saved my life." He tells his story and the two vagrants slink away.

THE DIAMOND-MAKER (Three Parts—March 4).—After years of scientific research Thomas Kellner, an eccentric chemist, succeeds in manufacturing an imitation diamond, with the help of his son, Jack. This diamond is such a wonderful imitation that even experts cannot tell it from the genuine article and the leading jewelers of the city, Tiffany & Co., are fooled completely. The son is so overjoyed and excited at their crowning success that his heart is affected and he dies. He is the master workman of the two and had been the one who turned out the imitation diamond. Fifteen years later his daughter, who has grown into beautiful womanhood, is engaged to Wynne Browning. All through the years she had kept her father's secret locked in her breast, though vowing constantly to avenge the death caused by his services to science, by making the world pay. She tells her sweetheart of her vow. They leave for the city to see what they can do toward disposing of it for ready cash.

Some means of communication must be established with Doris's grandfather, and they hit upon the idea of using carrier pigeons. They then go to Tiffany & Co., the famous jewelers, and tell them that if they are willing to deposit to their account ten million dollars the source of the fake diamond supply will be immediately destroyed. Wynne and Doris say that if this is not agreed to they will flood the market with spurious diamonds. The company objects strongly to paying the enormous price and engages a famous detective to trail Doris and her sweetheart. After watching them for a long time the detective is only able to discover their means of communication. At length one of the sleuth's men arrests an old tramp and on searching him discovers a number of the imitation stones. The third degree is resorted to and the crook confesses that the stones were given to him by an old man in Coalesdales, which is the retreat of Doris's grandfather and his workshop. In reality the thief had stolen them from the old man and, caught in the act, had murdered him. The detective immediately takes up the trail and goes to Coalesdales, where he at length locates the machinery for the manufacture of the fake diamonds. He reports to Tiffany & Co. his discovery. After consideration the jewelers decide that it is much better to settle with the girl, and a letter to this effect enclosing certified check is sent by them. Shortly after Doris and Wynne are married and the secret which would have revolutionized the diamond industry and created a panic among jewelers remained forever untold by the inventor's daughter BIRDS OF PASSAGE (March 8).—Sylvaine and Rosiene are as happy as two birds in a nest. He is a poor struggling artist and his pictures sell slowly. The landlord calls for his rent. Sylvaine cannot pay it and the landlord is about to put them out when Rosiene plays for him on her banjo. So charming is she that he leaves smiling.

Sylvaine goes forth in search of rent money with a canvas under his arm. While he is absent the landlord returns and makes ardent love to the charmer. Rosiene repels him and slaps his face. Enraged at this rebuff the old fellow goes forth in search of a bailiff and orders the artist and his pretty wife evicted. The bailiff enters and also falls victim to Rosiene's bewitching manner. She pours a drink for him, but just then her husband's footstep is heard on the stairs and she thrusts the bailiff into a closet, locking the door. Whispering the situation to her husband, he and Rosiene silently have their furniture removed and leave the bailiff meanwhile slowly suffocating in the closet. At this moment the landlord enters and hearing the smothered cries for help frees the poor bailiff.

ORCHIDS (March 8).—A flower is always a beautiful subject, but the exquisite varieties of orchids shown in this picture are beyond description. The famous Cattleyea orchid, which is worth $100 a flower, is shown in its rare beauty and the various means of crossing the species to produce certain varieties form a most interesting study on the screen. The opening of an orchid, which takes a full week, is shown in all its glory.

GOLD SEAL.

BY RADIUM'S RAYS (2 parts—March 3).—The story is of twin brothers, Jim, honest and steadfast, and Tom, a n'er-do-well. Both are in love with Sarah, daughter of an old miner. She is "cold" to the suit of the worthy brother, while she loves Tom and promises to become his wife. The brothers own a claim known as the "Twin Brothers' Mine." Believing it to be worthless, they give it to Sarah and her father. As he has lost the girl he loves, Jim leaves. Sarah's father works the mine.

During the early part of his married life, Tom goes from bad to worse. Finally he steals a shipment of gold en route to the U. S. Mint. After hiding it in the "Twin Brothers' Mine," he is captured. He refuses to divulge the hiding-place of the stolen gold and is sentenced to fifteen years in state's prison. In addition to this trouble, Sarah's baby dies. These multiplied sorrows cause her to lose her reason. She is removed to an insane asylum. At this time there is a great popular interest in the new radium process of a celebrated pathologist, who claims he can cure seventy-five per cent. of all insanity cases treated by his method.

Jim and Sarah's father visit the insane girl. The father shows her some new samples of ore from the claim. The insane girl is so struck with it that they allow her to retain it. The pathologist tells Jim that her reason can be restored by the radium process, but that the cure will be expensive. Jim then visits Tom, the convict, and explains the situation. Tom cannot direct his brother to the hiding-place of the stolen money, and as a consequence Jim offers to change places with him. The exchange is effected and Tom goes for the money. By a strange trick of fate Sarah's case is chosen for demonstration treatment. The pathologist discovers that the ore left with Sarah by her father is rich in radium. They go to the mine to make further investigation. A blast is set off. Tom is inside looking for the stolen money. He is fatally wounded by the blast, but before he dies he confesses concerning the prison episode. All hurry to the prison to secure Jim's liberty.

NESTOR.

SHE WAS ONLY A WORKING GIRL (2 parts—March 6).—Victoria is a simple country girl. John Taft, a villain, holds a mortgage on the old homestead, and threatens to foreclose. But Victoria comes to the rescue of her old father.

In the city Victoria is hired in the sweat shop of the villainous capitalist. Harry, the dirty foreman, is brutal to the honest working girls, but not to Victoria. He decides that she will be a rare morsel for his employer. Little does the defenseless girl realize that she has a friend in Bob, the honest elevator boy.

The capitalist tries to abduct Victoria, but she is saved by Bob. Now follows a tremendous battle between the youthful hero on one side and the villain and his evil cohorts on the other. After a thousand and one hazardous escapes Bob rescues the timid girl from a den on the water front. He takes her through a trap door and they escape. But the honest elevator boy is even now not satisfied. He captures Jerry and turns him over to the police. The desk sergeant recognizes him. In the meantime the capitalist is at the old farm with the sheriff. But Bob arrives in time to pay the mortgage of six dollars and sixty-five cents.

THE VOICE OF THE VIOLA (March 14).—This is a story of the love of two brothers for the same girl. Edward, the elder, is the fiddler of the small mountain village, while Wallace is a wood chopper. Through excessive bashfulness and because the girl is enchanted by Edward's playing, Wallace is unsuccessful in his suit.

Soon after the engagement, however, she becomes blind. Edward soon tires of the blind girl. Wallace learns to play his brother's violin. To spare her the humiliation of spurned love, he impersonates his brother, and during her dark hours when the realization of her affliction is great upon her, he plays the violin in his brother's place. A city surgeon, seeking rest, visits the village, examines the girl's eyes and tells the father that he can restore her sight. The surgeon operates successfully. The girl keeps the matter of her restored sight a secret. She sees Edward suing for the hand of another girl of the village. Then to her surprise she sees that it is Wallace who has been playing. She confides to him the successful nature of the operation. What he could not win by words he has won by silence. She loves him.

FRONTIER.

PRETZEL CAPTURES THE SMUGGLERS (March 5).—Heinze, secret service man, warns Pretzel, the chief custom officer, that the Mexican smugglers operating in that vicinity must be apprehended. Greaser Pete, the leader of the smugglers, makes love to Molly, a pretty senorita. Molly seeks and is given protection by the custom house officials. By an accident the cannon at the custom house is discharged and the ball strikes Pete's wife and knocks her down. The smugglers swear vengeance, and their threats are overheard by Molly, who goes to warn the custom men. Molly is herself captured by the smugglers, who tie her to the cannon, light the fuse and leave her.

Pretzel and Heinze are then captured by the smugglers. They are let over a cliff by a rope, which is tied to a tree at the top of the cliff. Under the rope fire is started, and the custom men are warned that when the rope burns through they will be dashed to pieces. But Pete's wife finds Molly tied to the cannon and releases her. Just as she does so the cannon goes off and knocks the smugglers over the cliff, and they land on the bottom on the other custom men. The rope burns through, and Pretzel and Heinze fall to the bottom, landing on the smugglers, who are now overpowered.

THE MYSTERY OF BUFFALO GAP (March 7).—Buffalo Gap is badly in need of a sheriff, but none of its citizens desire the job, due to the depredations of a mysterious bandit. Arthur and Joe are cattlemen and partners. Arthur is in love with Edythe, who returns his affection. About this time Willis comes to Buffalo Gap. He is offered the job of sheriff and accepts. But the mysteriols bandit continues to ply his trade.

The weeks pass. Arthur and Edythe are married. Arthur goes to town and there meets Bess. Joe, insanely jealous in nature, sees them walking together, and later accuses Bess. She laughs at him, and Joe leaves in a bitter mood. The following day when he accuses Arthur of stealing his girl, he is rewarded by a blow. Joe tells Edythe that her husband is unfaithful. Edythe demands an explanation from her husband, who refuses it and goes in search of Joe. Joe meets Bess, and she, tired of teasing him, tells him that she was merely walking home with Arthur from the store. The two leave to inform Edythe that they were simply playing a joke on her. They arrive at Edythe's and Arthur's cabin, find no one there, and leave a note stating they will return in an hour.

The stage to Buffalo Gap is held up and the mysterious bandit escapes with a shot that breaks his leg. He succeeds in crawling to Arthur's cabin. Arthur returns and finds the note on the door, which is signed by Joe. Edythe returns. Arthur, now suspicious, waits in the cabin, his intention being to shoot Joe on sight. Meanwhile the posse, finding the trail of blood, proceeds to follow. Someone is heard approaching outside and Arthur prepares to shoot. As he does so the mysterious bandit springs out from his hiding place and grapples with him. Outside Joe and Bess hear the fight and dash in. The mysterious bandit is overpowered. He is none other than their worthy sheriff.

VICTOR.

THE MAN BETWEEN (2 parts—March 2).—Returning to his camp after the theft of a herd of horses, the gypsy finds his wife dead and a newborn baby upon his hands. Hunted by the low and driven to extremities, he abandons his baby son at the door of a country squire. The squire is a bachelor. He takes the child in, adopts it and rears it to manhood with all the care of a real father. On his twenty-first birthday, the boy's betrothal to a girl of extreme goodness is announced.

The shadow of the past now creeps upon the boy's life. One night a burglar enters the squire's house. He is captured. It is the gypsy, the father of the squire's foster son. The squire realizes the relationship. An instant later all is explained to the son. He is the son of a thief. The gypsy is sent to prison.

Feeling his antecedents to be unworthy, the boy breaks his engagement. He figures that his father was a thief and that the taint of the blood will crop out sooner or later in him. He is enticed into the establishment of a vampire woman and she brings all her experience to bear in fascinating him. She partly succeeds and the boy sinks lower and lower. He is on the point of robbing his benefactor, the squire, when he awakens to the fact that he must overcome the imaginary taint of the blood and that he is a free agent for good or evil. He throws the vampire-woman over. She seeks him out and forgives all.

THE OPAL RING (2 parts—March 5).—The opal ring belongs to the kindly old aunt. Her grandniece desired it, but the aunt refused it, vaguely believing in the old superstition that surrounded it. Perhaps it was a whim that caused the girl to place the securing of the opal ring as a test for her affection. Or perhaps she wished to prove conclusively the falsity of the superstition. Certainly she little dreamed of the tragic results that were to follow when she told the two young men, both in love with her, that the one who secured it from the old aunt could claim her. Alice in her heart believed the one she favored would secure it, for she knew that the old aunt favored him. The play starts out almost a sa comedy. Then comes the forest shaft, in the shape of a letter from the aunt.

The letter states that the opal ring was almost stolen. "I recognized the would-be robber, a worthless tenant of mine, and frightened him away!" says the aunt. The two suitors, Fred and Will, decide to act at once before anything happens to the ring. That afternoon both visit the aunt and both are refused. Later, she writes a note to Fred, telling him to return that evening and that she will give him the ring. This note is seen by Will and he decides that there is only one way to get the ring and secure the heiress, whose money he particularly desires.

That night Fred secures the ring. After his departure when the lights have been switched off, a real robber, his identity hidden in the darkness, enters and secures the jewel case. The aunt tries to interfere—there is a struggle and the aunt is killed. Before dying she whispers to the servant that "he came back again."

Fred takes the ring to Alice. There, soon afterward, he is arrested as the thief. Will has an alibi to the fact that he was confined in his house at the time. Alice is overcome when told that the aunt is dead and imagines Fred guilty. Alice's father suspects Will, in spite of his alibi, and hires a detective. Then Alice enters the cause and tries to straighten out the mystery. She recalls the words of her aunt, "he came back again." Situation and complication pile up one on the other. Fred is tried and found guilty on circumstantial evidence, but through a clever bit of work by the girl the real thief is run down—it was the tenant, hired to do the work by Will. At the end Fred and Alice throw the ring into the flames. In his pocket Fred has something to take the place of it, a diamond ring which will bring love, happiness and good luck in its golden circlet.

POWERS.

THE TALE OF A DOG (March 2).—His master's love story as the faithful dog sees it. To begin with, the man and Fifi are great pals—until the master is bewitched by a coquette, a woman of the stage. Without consulting Fifi the master marries the woman. At first Fifi feels neglected. He is unhappy and ill-treated by his mistress. As such things happen, "the woman who never knew and never could understand" leaves the man and goes back on the stage. In the dark days which follow faithful Fifi watches over the deserted baby that she left for the limelight.

Despite the dog's care the baby dies. Fifi follows it to the cemetery, and when all the other mourners have left, the brokean-hearted father finds the dog lying on the grave of his first-born. Later when his master is seated contentedly on his easy chair with the dog on his lap, petting him in the old time way, perhaps Fifi realizes that in future no woman will share his disappointed master's affections.

THE HAND THAT RULES THE WORLD (March 6).—Edwin, the husband, is weary of social life, tired of those people whose only gospel is that of dress. He has come to realize that his only happiness will come through a congenial home life. As it is, Eva, his wife, is consumed with but two things, her dog and her gowns. He pleads with her to assume the obligations of a mother, but she is cold to his entreaties and bestows her charms upon another man. They are divorced. Eva goes with the other man and after a lapse of two years she gives birth to a child.

Edwin, in the interim, has also married a woman of his own ideas. He has children and he is exquisitely happy in the fulfillment of his dreams. Eva soon becomes a deserted mother. In the sordid life she leads she has long forgotten her gowns and vain fineries. In the greatest extremity, Eva bethinks herself of Edwin. She recalls his love for children and she concludes that now she is a mother he may forgive her and take her back. She goes to the home of her former social triumphs—an outcast. Crawling to a window she looks in and sees Edwin playing with his own children. She shrinks away and is gathered in by the darkness and despair.

CRYSTAL.

SOME PULL (March 3).—Pa weighs 350 lbs. His daughter, Ethel, has two admirers, Ethelbert and Alfred. Father detests both boys. Pa, suffering from a bad attack of gout, is unable to walk. The three do not know what to do. They try to carry him upstairs, but fail. Ethelbert gets the idea of tying a rope around pa and pulling him up. The rope is fastened and the pulling starts. They succeed in getting him up two or three steps when down he goes, bringing the others with him. They wind up in making a bed for pa at the foot of the stairs. Later, when the boys call again, after father has recovered, he treats them to a generous dose from the seltzer bottle, and admonishes them never to call again.

A STRANGE BIRD (March 3).—Walter Mason gets a letter of introduction to the Bromleys, from Sam French. Afterward, French writes the Bromleys that he has discovered that Mason is a swindler. Perkins, a traveling salesman, comes out of the station and Mason loses the letter. He decides to have some fun by pretending he is Mason. Perkins visits the Bromleys and is immensely pleased with the young lady of the house. Mr. Bromley and his son come home, and on finding out who the visitor is they take him out to the barn. Meanwhile, Mason is looking for his letter. The Bromleys tar and feather Perkins and chase him out. Mason comes across Perkins and takes him home with him. Perkins explains the situation to him and his regret at finding the letter of introduction, whereupon, when Mason informs him that he was the one the tar and feathers were meant for, poor Perkins faints.

LIZZIE AND THE ICEMAN (March 8).—Lizzie, a pretty servant girl, secures a job in the boarding house. There she is admired by the boarders. M. Schmaltz, the proprietor, helps her saw the wood, while his son carries up the coal. The other boarders do whatever they can to assist her. Her heart, however, has been won by Tim, the iceman. When Tim calls and sees the son making love to her he beats him up. The boarders fight among themselves and with their wives when their efforts at love-making to the pretty maid are discovered. Lizzie comes into the parlor and helps the cause along by applying a rolling pin thoroughly to their heads. When the house has been considerably wrecked, Lizzie, who has been hired to "clean up," returns to her duties in the kitchen. Tim enters and is accepted. They go upstairs, hand the sick boarders the laugh and exit.

THE HOUSE ACROSS THE STREET (March 5).—Mayor Walton secretly promises the Reform Party that if he is re-elected he will support the Prohibition Bill. To the "Wets" he gives evasive answers, hoping to "stall" them off until after election so as not to lose the saloon vote. Helen, Walton's daughter, is in love with Jack, his secretary. The Mayor sanctions the engagement. Big Mike, ward politician and one of the "Wet" bosses, is also in love with Helen. One day while calling on her he sees the Reform delegation leaving the Mayor's office and suspects. He goes to the Mayor and tells him that unless he will influence Helen to marry him he will ruin him.

Shortly after this there appears in the ranks of the "Wets" a young Irishman, Terry Donahue, authorized by the State Central Committee to reorganize the local party. The first thing Terry does is to oust Big Mike. Big Mike calls on Terry and attempts to bribe him. Terry accepts the bribe and later Big Mike tells Terry he will double the amount of the bribe if he will be a party to forcing Helen to marry him. Terry again accepts. Terry orders Big Mike arrested on a charge of bribery. Showing the check as evidence, he takes off his makeup and reveals himself as the Mayor.

A MODERN FAIRY TALE (March 8).—Once upon a time there lived a Princess. Her father was no better than an ogre and kept her locked within the castle. One day the ogre called his daughter and told her that she must marry the ugly old Lord Burleigh. She felt very bad over it because she had a true love of her own, a country swain.

From a high window in the castle, she signaled her lover and told him the terrible fate in store for her. The following day there arrived an emissary from a noble Prince asking the Princess' hand in marriage. The new offer met with the approval of the ogre. But the day of the wedding arrived and the swain had failed to return. The old ogre discharged the good nurse from his service just as the new Prince arrived. To save her young mistress, the nurse placed her in the pack upon her back, and intended thus to smuggle her out of the castle. But to the anger of the ogre and the joy of all others the new Prince proved to be the young swain—the Princess' lover. So they were married and lived happily ever after.

A BARRIER ROYAL (2 parts—March 11).—Princess Marie, ward of Duke D'Artier, has been betrothed to Prince De Conti, an Italian, and known as the vilest man in all Italy. The Princess refuses to marry the Prince, dresses as a peasant and obtains employment in the vineyards of France. She is saved from an attack by Jacques, overseer of the vineyards. Marie and Pierre Prue, whose sister is the Princess' maid, and who assisted the Princess to escape from the castle, to save themselves from punishment, plan that Pierre shall say that Marie, in order to escape from Jacques, has drowned herself and Pierre offers the cap and apron of Marie as proof. Instead of Jacques believing the story, he accuses Pierre of drowning Marie and has him arrested and sent to prison. In the meantime the Duke and Prince have sent out retainers searching for Marie. The Prince issues the order that if Marie is not brought to him on or before their wedding day, the Duke shall pay with his head. Marie goes to court to free Pierre, but sooner than return to the castle and be compelled to marry the Prince, she drowns herself in the lake in the castle gardens, and her body is presented to the Prince on their wedding day.

KAY-BEE.

THE RAIDERS (2 parts—Feb. 20).—Bill Evans is a moonshiner in the mountains of Kentucky, where he lives with his wife and daughter, Mary. Jack Keane, a handsome young moonshiner, loves Mary and they are married, much to the disappointment of Bill Gale, another moonshiner, a rejected lover of Mary.

A month later Bill Gale is in a barroom. He sees a poster offering a $250 reward for information leading to the arrest of anyone operating an illicit still in the district. He betrays the location of the Evans' still to the revenue officers for the reward. Cyril, a typical mountain boy, out hunting, overhears the traitor plot with the revenue men to raid the still, and tries to warn the moonshiners, but in his haste to reach the still he falls into a chasm and is thus delayed. Gale rushes back to the still to avoid suspicion, explaining his absence by saying that he had gone for tobacco. That night the still is raided and demolished. Cyril at last reaches Mary Evans' cabin to tell her that the officers are raiding the still. Bill Evans, Mrs. Evans and Cyril all go with the moonshiners to fight the revenue officers, but Mary will stay to wait for her husband, who has not been seen since the beginning of the raid.

In the meanwhile Bill Gale is shot. He runs to Mary's cabin, begging her to protect him. She will not listen to him, for she knows he is the traitor. Locking Gale in her cabin, she leaves to find the moonshiners to deliver him into their hands, but changes her plans when she sees the revenue officers approaching. She returns to her cabin and tells Gale she has changed her mind and will save him. She opens the door and tells him to run for his life. The officers mistake Gale for one of the moonshiners and kill him by mistake. Mary hears the shot, knows that Gale is dead and is exultant. She leaves her cabin to look for her husband, but finds him dead on the trail.

DOMINO.

THE COURTSHIP OF O SAN (2 parts—Feb. 26).—Shotoku, the son of the Marquis Osaka, attends a theater and falls in love with O San, one of the actresses. He makes love to her, disguising himself as a tradesman. The marriage is arranged unknown to Osaka. Later Osaka betroths Shotoku to Yama, the daughter of Baron Kamuri. Shotoku protests, but his father forces him into the marriage. Shotoku sends O San to her people, telling her that he has to go to America. However, she sees the announcement of the wedding, for Shotoku had told her after their marriage his real identity. She disguises herself as one of the entertainers at the wedding festivities and during a dance stabs Shotoku. She escapes, but is pursued and brought back to the dying Shotoku. He asks that they be left alone. He asks her forgiveness and dies in her arms. She then commits suicide, and they find her beside his body.

PAPER

When it comes to a question of paper, we bump into the bugaboo of every exhibitor from Maine to California. There's no denying the fact that the crowds are affected—one way or the other—by the paper displayed for their approval.

We, of Warner's Features, Inc., have been paying particular attention to the paper for our three-a-week releases. We have endeavored to retain the "action" and the "color" without sacrificing the truth. Hundreds of satisfied customers tell us that we have succeeded.

How about it?

Sidney Olcott Distinguishes Himself in Gauntier Drama

"THE EYE OF THE GOVERNMENT"

Powerful Three Part Story

Flavored with the atmosphere of the sea, this splendid production by the Gene Gauntier Feature Players is bound to create a lot of talk when exhibited to intelligent audiences.

Sidney Olcott stars as the clever detective employed by the U. S. Custom authorities to run down a wealthy smuggler (Jack J. Clark) operating between New York and Ireland. The greater part of the action is carried out aboard a giant ocean liner. There are also numerous scenes laid in the prettiest parts of Ireland. Mr. Olcott and

"YOU SMUGGLER"

Mr. Clark are ably assisted by Miss Gauntier and a noteworthy cast.

This production takes on added interest because of the fact that it follows the scenario prepared by the editors of The Motion Picture Story Magazine.

A Clever Dog Stars in this Story of the Philippines

"SAVED BY THE HEAD HUNTERS"

Thrilling Three Part Drama

Here is a feature production absolutely unique in theme and treatment. Imagine the difficulties that had to be overcome by the director in order to secure the intimate views of life in an Igorrote Village which were required as settings for the action of the story. Picture the patience it required to drill these Philippine savages in their parts.

If this feature does not thrill your patrons, with its masterful plot and barbaric settings, then they are past thrilling.

FRIENDLY HEAD HUNTERS

It fulfills every requirement for action with a desperate battle between the Igorrotes (aided by the hero and heroine) and a piratical crew off a visiting ship. Thanks to the sagacity of a well-trained dog, the castaways are rescued by a detachment of Uncle Sam's Marines who drive off the intruders and thereby earn the good will of the head hunters.

Swims Stormy Sea to Rescue His Sweetheart

"THE ISLE OF VENGEANCE"

Three Reels of Thrills

This remarkable Warner's Feature is sure to hold the close attention of your patrons because it possesses all the elements of the ideal feature production.

The plot is a gripping one; the scenes are elaborate; the photography is superb and there is something happening every minute the picture is on the screen.

"TOO LATE"

The hero's swim through a stormy sea to rescue his sweetheart, imprisoned on the Isle of Vengeance, is a daring bit of work—a deed that required real courage to perform.

The retribution that befalls the social pirate responsible for the heroine's imprisonment furnishes a fitting climax to a story of unusual strength and interest.

THE CRUCIBLE (Mar. 2).—Dan Ryan emigrates to the United States and immediately finds work as a street laborer. While wielding his pick one day, Mary Carter, daughter of the mayor, and Richard Hoyne, her suitor, drive past in an automobile. Out of curiosity Mary orders the machine stopped and she takes a kodak picture of a man with a barrow on a plank.

Evincing a liking for politics, Ryan enters the game, and two years later is elected alderman. He and Mary meet and fall in love, Mary failing to recognize in him the former street laborer. He wins her hand. One day, in looking over Mary's photo-album, Hoyne comes across the snapshot of the street gang and recognizes Ryan's picture. As a result of the revelation, her father compels Mary to break the engagement, telling Ryan that "only a man of good birth can marry his daughter."

Later, Ryan stumbles into a room where Hoyne is bribing a number of aldermen to vote against a public utilities bill. He manages to confiscate the agreement and escape with it, following a fight. In council that night, he produces the bribe agreement during a fiery speech and the bill is passed, greatly to the joy of the mayor, to whom its defeat would have meant political ruin. Ryan becomes popular with the people and is elected the next mayor. Convinced that the crucible has produced a gentleman, Carter consents to the marriage of his daughter to Ryan. The kodak picture is given a conspicuous position in the office of the new mayor.

THE PURSUER PURSUED (Mar. 5).—Claude Howard, an Eastern college boy, getting his start in life on a Western ranch, is not as well versed in saddling bucking horses as he is in making love to Florence Stanley, the ranch-owner's daughter. Mr. Stanley naturally objects, and finding Claude with his daughter when he should be working, fires him on the spot and tells him not to come near the ranch again. But Claude comes back to say good-bye to Florence. Hearing Stanley approach, he crawls under the table. Stanley is going off for the day and asks Florence to keep an eye on a large sum of money that he has in the house. Before Claude can get away, Mrs. Stanley comes into the room with her sewing. Claude, under the table, feels like a permanent fixture, but his hiding place proves a blessing in disguise. For Pedro, a Mexican hanger-on at the ranch, manages to secure the money that Stanley asked Florence to watch and makes his get-away. Claude, jumping on the first handy horse, gives chase. Pedro, meeting Stanley, tells him that Claude has turned horse thief, and rides on. Claude comes up, but before Stanley can stop him is off again after Pedro. Stanley and the cowboys give chase to Claude. The pursuer is being pursued. Claude catches up with Pedro and a fight ensues. Stanley comes up. Claude explains, and so does Pedro, but their stories do not agree, so Stanley has the cowboys take both Pedro and Claude to the ranchhouse under cover. Here the women confirm Claude's story. Stanley apologizes, gives Claude his job on the ranch again and also his permission to make love to Florence—at the proper times, of course.

A CHILD OF THE DESERT (Mar. 7).—Tom Manning, a young cattle man in Montana, while looking over the range with one of his men, sees in the valley below them the remains of a massacre. Riding down upon the overturned prairie schooner, they discover the dead bodies of a man and a woman. A little baby girl rises from the breast of its dead mother, and is cared for by the big hearted westerner. At dawn the following morning the child, picking prairie flowers, wanders away and is lost to Tom, who frantically scours the country for her to no avail.

A freighter crossing the plains stops at a water-hole to take on a supply of water. Leaving his schooner and oxen, the little orphan climbs in and falls asleep. Arriving at his destination, the freighter discovers the baby. He is a brutal man and raises the child only to stake her in a poker game against his financial losses. Manning, years later, comes upon this scene of action and himself takes a hand in the game, winning the girl. He takes her to his mother. Love dominates all and a happy ending gives to this story an unusual power.

BEAUTY FILM.

ITALIAN LOVE (Mar. 4).—Angelo, a statuette vender, and Lugi, a street musician, are rivals for the hand of Maria, the proprietress of a prosperous fruit shop. Maria prefers Lugi, and this so enages the statuette vender, that he avenges himself by stealing his rival's monkey and grind-organ. Lugi is heart-broken, but doesn't suspect who the thief is.

Soon after, Angelo's cousin, Tonny Spezotti, arrives from Italy, and the crafty Angelo determines at once to profit by his cousin's "greenness" and inexperience. Accordingly he outfits Tony with the stolen grind-organ and monkey and starts him out to "getta-da-mon."

Unfortunately, in his peregrinations, Antonio stops before the fruit shop of Marie, and strikes up a popular ditty. Lugi—who is bewailing his loss of Maria—hears the familiar strains of his organ and rushes out to investigate. Recognizing his property, he pounces furiously upon poor, innocent Tony, and has him arrested. At the station Tony succeeds in placing the blame on his unscrupulous cousin, who is immediately arrested and brought before the desk sargeant. While the sergeant is trying to get the facts of the case, Lugi attacks Angelo with a stiletto and the two engage in a furious duel. Both land in a cell. Maria is broken-hearted over the arrest of her beloved Lugi, and her grief so affects poor, excitable Tony, that he too bursts into tears. As a result, each turns to the other for sympathy, and Tony conducts the sorrowing Maria back to her shop.

A week later Angelo and Lugi are released from jail and hasten to the fruit store at once. Imagine their surprise when poor, ignorant, despised little Tony meets them at the door in his shirt-sleeves and announces that he is now proprietor of the shop. To prove it he drags them happily inside and points to a beautiful, brand new marriage certificate adorning the wall next to the fruit shop license. Stung! is the word and as the two poor "wops" stumble miserably from the shop, the blushing Maria presents them each with a large lemon for remembrance.

RELIANCE.

A WORKING GIRL'S ROMANCE (Feb. 18).—Nell Goodwin, a little glove maker in a large silk glove factory, is supporting her mother, brother and sisters with her work. She is engaged to Bob Templeton, who is also a factory worker. Neither feels justified in getting married, because a heavy mortgage is hanging over the cottage. Nell is discouraged, and one day while working in the factory, she decides to take a chance with Dame Fortune. She wrjtes a little note and slips it into one of the new gloves that has just been completed, irons it out carefully, and places it in a box to go out with all of the other gloves.

The next scene shows the glove being purchased in a big New York department store by Marion Van Brown. The scene changes to the drawing room of Marion's home. She is a very badly spoiled heiress and is engaged to Jack Montague, a young New York broker. Jack has a run of hard luck in Wall Street, and he goes to Marion for comfort. She becomes furious that he has lost so much money, quarrels with him and breaks the engagement. The rival suitor for her hand, Count de Beaumont, arrives just after the girl has quarreled with her fiancé. He invites her to go to the opera, and as Jack leaves the house angrily, she goes upstairs to get her wraps. Entering the room, she opens the box of new gloves and starts to put them on, when she sees the little note. It reads:

"To whoever finds this message: I am a working girl. I'm trying so hard to support mother, Jimsy and Bessie. My sweetheart, Bob, and I want to get married, but we can't afford it with mother so sick and the mortgage on our cottage, and Bob's mother must be cared for as well. Maybe some lady who receives this can give me some advice so that my dreams may come true. Nell Goodwin, Address."

Marion picks up the photograph of Jack Montague, and realizes that she has been treating him unfairly. She decides to visit the little girl who wrote the letter.

She arrives at the factory the next morning and sends in her card to the manager, who summons Nell. Marion is taken to Nell's house. There Marion sees what happiness and good cheer can exist in dire poverty when happiness is predominant. She sees Nell wait on her invalid mother, the little youngsters cheerfully helping. Bob Templeton, Nell's sweetheart, comes to lunch and Marion meets him. Marion learns her lesson. Telling him and them after a frugal meal that she must go for the train, Marion sends her maid out to buy a lot of good things for the family, and leaves a note in an envelope addressed to Nell, which the mother promises to deliver the next morning. Marion telegraphs Jack: "Forgive me, I love you better poor than ever before. Meet me at the six-ten train from Buffalo. Marion."

Marion is seen on the train, and a flash back shows Nell opening the envelope to find a check for $500 for a little wedding gift. Jack meets Marion at the depot. When Jack asks for an explanation, Marion shows him the note.

AN INTERRUPTED SEANCE (Feb. 21).—A couple of actors are thrown out of a job and spend their last dollar for a reading at a seance by a famous clairvoyant, who lives up the street from their boarding house. He gets their dollar so easily that they decide to get some easy money too, and disguised as a clairvoyant, one of them goes to work. His pal and he put up a sign under the clairvoyant's, pointing up to their house, and then hang a sign on their door. The crowds begin to come. The landlord hears the noise of the spirits rapping. One of the actors is covered with plaster knocked down on him by the other actor, who is hiding under the table to help out his pal in the "clairvoyanting." The landlord calls on them. The real clairvoyant discovers the plan and calls, and the two actors are unmasked and chased miles out of town.

THE GREEN-EYED DEVIL (2 parts—Feb. 28).—Jim Miller lives in a cheap tenement with his wife and his sister. They had been in a better position in other days, but Jim has developed into a morose half-drunken character, suspicious and high-tempered. The sister leaves her own husband and comes to live with Jim. However, she is jealous of her sister-in-law and goes out of her way to be mean to her, and to poison Jim's mind against the weak, pretty thing who is his wife. One day Jim gets out of a job and while he is out looking for work and the sister is away at her work in the factory, Mary, the wife, steals out determined to add to the common share, while her husband is in hard luck. She finds work painting clay figures, an art for which she shows some talent. But she is afraid of Jim's wildness and as soon as she collects money she secrets it for a rainy day. One day after she has worked hard and hoarded some money, the sister comes in unexpectedly upon her, and when Mary goes out of the room finds the money in an old vase. They watch Mary go out after that and Jim's sister poisons him against his wife and at the same time shows the accumulation of money.

Mary is suspicious of being watched and so to keep them from learning about the money she paints at home and has a young man from the factory call for the work. The young man, Willard Meeks, does this because he is attracted to the pretty woman. However, he is a rough sort of fellow and one day he catches her and tries to kiss her. She fights him off and he says if she does not kiss him he will make her lose her position. She is a weak-minded woman, and with starvation staring them in the face, she braves herself to endure his embrace. As it happens at that moment, the sister has been watching and although she knows the true state of affairs, she runs into another room and gets Jim to look just at the moment of the embrace. Jim tries to rush in to kill her. The sister suddenly divining his state of mind begins to confess and at last does hold him off until Mary repulses the boy, denounces him and shows the true state of affairs to her husband. The sister is repentant and the husband begs forgiveness.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Feb. 23—Chapter 6).—The growing irritation between Margaret and her aunt because of the former's proclivity for girlish pranks in her impulsive determination to keep up the acquaintance of her country boy lover, comes to a climax in the sixth reel of the series when Margaret, after a restless night spent in tears, surreptitiously leaves the home of her aunt.

She has no definite plan in mind, but is obsessed with the idea of romantically fleeing to her lover, whom she believes will intervene between the scheming Count and her aunt's aspirations. After breakfast, Margaret steals to her room and packs a few belongings into a handbag. Unobserved by her maid or the butler, she creeps out of the front door and hails a passing taxicab. The driver is ordered to proceed to the Cunard Line docks, where the country boy is at work.

Arriving at the dock, Margaret discovers that she has come away without any money and a rough scene takes place when she is unable to pay the cab driver. A crowd gathers and things are becoming serious when the country boy, attracted by the crowd, rushes to Margaret's rescue and gets into a fist fight with the cab driver, whom he knocks down and injures. This furnishes food for special editions of the New York newspapers, which tell of the exciting scene.

Meanwhile Margaret's disappearance has been discovered by the aunt. The wildest excitement prevails. The Count is pressed into service and police headquarters are notified. The aunt accompanied by the Count go in quest of Margaret. A sudden inspiration takes them to the office of the country boy, where they learn that both Margaret and her lover have fled. Distracted by her inability to find Margaret, the aunt and Count return home where elaborate preparations are made for her apprehension. Meanwhile the country boy, realizing the impulsive folly of Margaret's act, determines to take her back to her aunt and on the way uptown to distract her mind, he shows her some of the great skyscrapers of New York. They visit the Woolworth Building, the highest in the world and after a few hours of this tramping about, they return to the home of Margaret's aunt.

The greeting between Margaret and her aunt is one of affection and the honest intentions of the country boy are rewarded by the aunt, who thanks him and invites him to the house, much to the anger of the Count, who is present. The reconciliation is completed and Margaret retires that night a happy girl.

THE MUSICIAN'S WIFE (Feb. 25).—Jan, a symphony orchestra violinist, meets and falls in love with Jo, a young music student. They are married and live happily till Jan, whose eyes are failing, is discharged from the orchestra. Madge, the daughter of a wealthy lady, and in love with Jan herself, is his pupil, and when repulsed by him, later tells the wife that Jan has been discharged from the orchestra because he has been unable to keep in practice owing to the wife's foolish demands on his time and attention. Jan, returning home, avoids his wife, dreading to tell her that he is going blind. She mistakes his distant manner for anger. Believing that she has been a stumbling block to his progress, she resolves to go away. A friend of Jan's later finds him groping about his house totally blind. A note from his wife stating only that she left because one should not be a burden to another, so angers the friend that he resolves to find the wife and compel her to return home.

Jan, who is too proud to be an object of charity to the wife, whom he believes has left him because of his affliction, decides that he will leave. He is gone when his wife returns. Heartbroken, she searches the city, but with no success. Madge in the meantime having learned of the mischief she has unwittingly done, assists the wife in her search. Early in her search she finds him and takes the blind violinist to her own home, and has an operation performed on his eyes, he not knowing who has befriended him. Her love for Jan tempts her to undo the work of the great specialist who has nearly finished a successful treatment of Jan's eyes, in order that she may have the man she loves near her always, but her better nature asserts itself and she reunites Jan and his wife.

GRIFFITH FILM.

THE SINGLE STANDARD (Special—5 parts—Mutual).—Frank Andrews is a successful business man. He has always found pride and joy in the company of his wife, son and daughter. He suddenly finds himself enthralled by the advances of a gay young woman siren, who lives in the same apartment house as he does. So marked an influence does she have over him as time progresses that at last he quite forgets his home ties, neglects his family, and goes the way of many other men who have forgotten the meaning of paternity and blood ties. The story is advanced through many scenes enacted with the accompanying notes of New York's night life, and the denouement comes when the faithful wife discovers her husband's infidelity. At this time the mother's mind nearly loses balance, while Jane, the beautiful daughter, crazed by the grief of her mother, determines to take part in the tragedy. With revolver in hand she steals up to the apartment of the woman, but her frail nature is overcome by the temperamental anger of the woman and her mission fails. However, the errand is not fraught with failure for the father, coming in at this moment, finds his daughter being made love to by the sweetheart of the young woman, and realizes the road upon which he has traveled. When he confronts his daughter and says, "You, my daughter—what are you doing here?" The daughter answers, "My father, what are you doing here?" The realization is brought home to the father's mind that the law of moral ethics that governs a woman's life necessarily governs that of wan as well. Reformation comes in his character. He takes his daughter away with him and together they go back to their home of happiness and content.

THE GOLDEN CROSS— (2 parts—Feb. 24).—To the time of the first Napoleon there lived in the village of Melun a miller and his sister. They were very devoted, and when the miller fell in love with Theresa, the chum of his sister, Christine, they were more united than ever. On their wedding day just as the guests were assembling, a detachment of soldiers arrived and Nicholas, the miller, was informed that he had been conscripted and must leave at once for duty with the army. He vainly pleaded with the soldiers, who told him that the only way he could escape duty would be by supplying a substitute. Christine, the sister, noted for her beauty, took a golden cross from her neck and offered it to the man who would take her brother's place as a pledge that she would marry him on his return from the war. At first none accepted the offer, and Christine returned into the house dejected to pray, when a young French nobleman who was visiting the village in disguise, came forward and offered to take the miller's place. He had seen Christine and fallen in love with her at first sight and was willing to risk anything for her sake.

During the campaign that followed the rascally sergeant stole the golden cross while the young soldier was desperately wounded and then deliberately abandoned him on the battlefield. The sergeant returned to Melun, falsely claimed that he was the one who had taken the place of Nicholas, and claimed his reward. Christine, although she felt an instinctive dislike to him, determined to keep her word, and preparations for the wedding went on. In the meantime the young count had made a daring escape from his prison and arrived in Melun just in time to confront the villainous sergeant and inflict upon him the punishment he deserved; then the count and the miller's sister were married, and the supposition is that they lived happy forever after.

THEIR BEST FRIEND (Feb. 27).—A young heiress was wooed and won by a man whom she believed would make her happy. She told of her engagement to her uncle, who was also her guardian, and was pleased and surprised when he interposed no objection. The uncle was a crafty man, however. His accounts of the estate were in a very bad way and he feared that if his niece married and his books were examined he might land in the penitentiary, consequently he was not anxious to see her a happy bride, but being crafty to know what the worst thing for him to do would be to object to the man she selected, so he pretended to be very fond of the suitor and praised him on all occasions.

A night or two after the engagement was announced the girl came downstairs and was about to enter the reception room when her uncle begged her to go away. Despite his insistence she would see somebody in the room and was convinced it was her sweetheart. She insisted upon her right to enter and finally did so, only to discover that the man she loved was apparently hopelessly drunk. The uncle tried to excuse him by saying "Boys will be boys," but she brushed him aside and determinedly broke off the engagement. The young man's father was also incensed and disowned the son, totally believing his story that he had only taken one drink with the guardian, who had proposed a toast in honor of the engagement. The suitor wrote many letters to the girl, but none of them were delivered, for the old uncle tore them all up, so the girl believed that the man had forgotten her and nursed her sorrow in secret.

Fortunately for her, she overheard a conversation one night between her uncle and the butler, in which the whole plot was revealed. The uncle with the assistance of the butler had drugged the drink given the young man and had artfully arranged things so he appeared hopelessly intoxicated. The uncle had also destroyed all the letters the suitor had sent, so search for the missing one was a difficult proposition. The boy's father knew he was somewhere in Chicago, but Chicago is a large place. The girl and the father, however, went there and hunted about through the city, finally being led to the side of the young man by his faithful dog, whom for months he had regarded as his best and only friend.

MAJESTIC.

THE REFORM CANDIDATE (Three Parts—Feb. 22))—A wave of reform sweeps the country, engulfing the town of Richmond. James Stanley, a wealthy young man of fine principles and high ideals, interested in philanthropy and reform, is nominated for mayor. Politicians predict an easy victory for Stanley. Even Tom Mitchell, "boss" of the opposition, believes Stanley will be elected. Mitchell bribes one of his henchmen, Fred Osborne, to spy upon Stanley and to delve into his past. Osborne secures work with Stanley as his private secretary, but is unable to find any flaw in his record. While working in the double capacity of private secretary for Stanley, and spy for Mitchell, Osborne finds time also to carry on some questionable work of his own, and pays assidous court to Doris, Stanley's young and attractive wife. Stanley is so engrossed in philanthropy and reform that he neglects Doris seemingly, although he loves her truly. He notes Osborne's attentions to his wife and becomes jealous.

A crisis is reached when Stanley makes arrangements to speak at an important political meeting on a certain evening, forgetting that he had previously promised to take Doris to the opera the same evening. She is dressed, ready to go, when she finds it is impossible for Stanley to accompany her. He starts for the meeting, forgetting his typewritten speech, while Doris, piqued, and in a reckless mood, accepts Osborne's proffered escort. Mistaking Doris' forced gaiety and recklessness for encouragement, Osborne presumes too far, and when Stanley returns for his forgotten speech, he finds his wife struggling in Osborne's arms. A bitter quarrel (which is overheard by the servants), ensues, and Osborne is ordered from the house. In his anger, Stanley refuses to listen to any explanation from Doris. He rushes off to the political meeting, where he receives an ovation. Returning home, flushed with triumph, he finds a note from Doris, stating she can no longer endure his neglect and unjust suspicions and has left him forever. He believes she has fled with Osborne.

Osborne, having failed to discover anything to Stanley's discredit, Mitchell and Russell (Stanley's opponent), alarmed over Stanley's growing popularity, decides to adopt drastic measures, and they employ Iris Deremer, a clever and fascinating adventuress, to entangle the reformer in a web of intrigue. By a decoy message, Iris lures Stanley to a fashionable gambling house, which Mitchell had arranged to have raided, believing the resultant publicity and scandal of Stanley's arrest in such a place will ruin him politically. Fate takes a hand and more than Mitchell planned for, occurs. A crime is committed which is witnessed by Iris. The lights are switched off; the regular habitues of the place escape by a secret passage; and Stanley is caught and held pending the coroner's inquest. Stanley's adherents are scandalized, excitement is rife, and the daily papers fairly blister with scareheads denouncing the "so-called reformer."

The coroner's inquest is set for the day before the election, and to accommodate the crowds, it is held in the courtroom. The news of the tradgedy reaches Doris in the quiet boarding house where she is hiding. With a wife's intuition, she knows instantly he is incapable of committing such a crime and determines to clear him. Her suspicions are directed toward Mitchell. Disguised as a messenger boy she gains entrance to Mitchell's office, and overhears a quarrel between the "boss" and Iris, who calls for her reward. Mitchell, believing Stanley is done for, and no longer needing Iris' help, breaks his promise to her and refuses to pay her anything. In her anger and spurred on by the desire for revenge, Iris tells the truth (which is overheard by Doris), that French Shot Osborne and Stanley is innocent. Pledging Iris to secrecy, Mitchell now pays Iris all she asks and she departs.

Doris, in her excitement, makes a movement, which they hear, and she is brought forth from her place of concealment. Her cap is knocked off, her hair comes down, but no one knows who she is. Mitchell believes she has been employed to spy upon him, and orders her locked in an anteroom. Leaving Doris tied to a chair, and locked in, Mitchell and Russell start to attend the inquest. After several fruitless attempts, Doris escapes by climbing out of a window and working her way along the ledge to the next window, which leads to another room, where she escapes to the street.

Meanwhile, the inquest is being held, and things look black for Stanley. The men caught during the raid testify that Stanley and Osborne were quarreling bitterly just before the lights were switched off and Osborne was shot. Stanley's own servants also give damaging testimony regarding Stanley's quarrel with Osborne the night of Mrs. Stanley's mysterious disappearance. Mitchell and Russell, who are present, are jubilant over the proceedings.

The coroner sums up the evidence, the jury is about to retire when there is a commotion in the court room, and Doris (still wearing the messenger boy's suit), rushes in, followed by two plain clothes men with Iris and French. The jury is recalled; Doris testifies; French confesses, and Stanley is cleared during a wild scene in the courtroom. A reconciliation between Doris anr Stanley follows, and they are both carried from the courtroom on the shoulders of their admirers, followed by the cheering crowd. This is on the eve of election. The following day, Stanley is elected mayor by an overwhelming majority.

THE RIVAL BARBERS (Feb. 28).—Mike O'Shea conducts a little barber shop and does very poor business because Heine Schwartz, the barber across the street, gets nearly all the trade. Mrs. O'Shea suddenly has an inspiration, and the result of her thought is that the next day Mike takes leave of her and departs. Heine is very happy, for he believes that he will have the entire field to himself.

His happiness is short lived, for Mrs. O'Shea hangs out a sign, "Lady Barbers Here," and with a lady assistant soon draws all the trade to her shop. Heine is hard pressed and then he, too, has an inspiration. A tramp with a cur dog is enlisted in his cause, and the dog, his mouth covered with a generous lather of shaving soap, runs into Mrs. O'Shea's shop to the accompaniment of cries of "mad dog." A riot ensues, and in the confusion it is discovered that Mrs. O'Shea's "lady assistant" is none other than Mike himself, disguised to draw trade to his shop.

BEE FARMING (Feb. 19).—This is a companion film to that issued on Monday, Nov. 10, which illustrates the wonders of bee life. This film illustrates in a very striking manner the advantages which such a simple little creature as the bee confers upon mankind. In some respects it may be considered to possess an educational interest, but there can be no doubt that it demonstrates in a very striking manner a feature which should attract the attention of those to whom honey is nothing but an acceptable addition to the table.

THE BEE (Feb. 19).—Apart from the old dim tales of ancient mythology, where there is a romance to account for all beginnings of the world and everything upon it, any attempt to trace back the art of bee-keeping to its earliest inception cannot fail to bring us to the conclusion that it is inevitably and literally the oldest craft under the sun. While it is reasonable to assume that the first men used honey as an article of diet, it is probable that they were a wandering race, and therefore unlikely to be bee-keepers in the accepted sense of the word. So far as this country is concerned there can be no doubt that the Romans taught the Britons their own methods of bee management and improved on the rough and ready practice of the British. This film is one of two which reveal to us the marvelous part the honeybee plays and offers an insight into an engrossing study.

THE MAGIC SALESMAN (Feb. 19).—Tom Jones was a traveler with a magic portmanteau. His duty was not simply to call on shopkeepers, but to call on anyone who wanted supplies of anything. His portmanteau was stocked until it should have split with all sorts, shapes and conditions of commodities. To judge from the results at the end of the day, he was a man who should have traveled with an omnibus and not with a portmanteau, as he would supply anything; provisions, furniture, children, brides and bridegrooms, tenants for houses, almost anything that one could name. He called on a couple who were regretting the fact that they had had no offspring. Jones left them delighting over the possession of four children. He supplied a bride and bridegroom for the mayor to marry. He supplied an empty house with furniture and a tenant from his portmanteau and returned to his office perfectly satisfied with his work.

LUX.

PAT'S MOTOR (Feb. 27).—This film is a most decidedly clever display of the versatile talents and unprecedented daring of Pat, the Lux comedian. It deals with his alarming adventures as the owner of a motor car, and will produce a thrill unequalled in even the most exciting of dramas. After a very charming trip, in which Bill delights in many daring capers, the car comes to a dead stop. Discerning that something has gone wrong with the works, Pat searches for trouble with a match. Yes! He is feeling a little better now, thank you.

LAKES AND FALLS (Feb. 27).—A splendid scenic film, showing wonderful sights among the numerous and beautiful waterfalls of Plezervitzer in Austro Hungary.

BILL'S DAY OUT (Mar. 6).—Bill pays a visit to his cousin and aunt, and is on his best behavior until the latter is called away, when he determines to attend the fair, and with his cousin upon his arm, Bill wanders off. They try the helter-skelter, with disastrous results for Bill, and in bargaining for toffee, Bill drags a yard or so of the sticky stuff off the stall. Passing a boxing booth, Bill determines to have a spar, and despite the pleadings of his cousin, enters with her. Two gigantic blacks are conducting a bout, and Bill chooses one of them as his opponent. An extremely funny scene follows, in which Bill succeeds in knocking out the black. Then lunch is the next item on the program, concluding with a cigar. At first all is well, and Bill enjoys his smoke immensely, but the aftermath is terrible, and it is a very wan and pale Bill who is escorted back home.

A STONE QUARRY IN BELGIUM (Mar. 6).—This is an extremely interesting industrial subject, illustrating the various processes incidental to quarrying. The picture commences with a view of the workmen extracting the stone by means of a drill. Views of the cranes lifting huge cylindrical blocks, and the extraction of rectangular stone are followed by many interesting scenes depicting the lifting and piercing of the stone. A view of the workmen leaving the quarry concludes this fine subject, which showmen should make a point of ordering.

AMBROSIO.

MICHAEL PERRIN; or A SPY FOR A DAY (Four Parts).—The character of Michael Perrin is most wonderfully portrayed by Ermete Novelli, the greatest of great actors, the idol of the European stage. We see him loudly applauded by his ardent admirers before he retires to assume the disguise of his famous role. The first scene opens in the humble abode of the poor parish priest Michael Perrin, who is bidding farewell to his sister and her daughter, Theresa. He takes them to the stage coach and after many tears and embraces, finally sees them off on their return to Paris, and then wends his way homeward. It is several months later, while Michael is in the schoolroom of the church, engaged in teaching the little children to master the first stroke of the pen, the villagers are aroused by the approaching Republican troops. In a short time they enter the schoolroom and, regardless of Father Perrin's pleadings, they turn him and the children out and set fire to the old church. Alone and homeless, Michael decides to take shelter with his sister in Paris. His Joy at meeting Theresa is darkened when he learns that his sister is dead. While his niece is showing him the little cross left by her mother, Bernard, her betrothed, enters, and with jesting words of congratulation the old man blesses them. Unfortunately, Theresa is out of work, and in order to maintain her uncle and herself, she is obliged to part with her little cross. Bernard having sold it, is on his way home when he meets Grussac, an old comrade, who makes an appointment to visit him the next day. Unknown to her uncle, Theresa does some sewing at night. He discovers her little secret the next morning, when he finds her asleep over her work, the little lamp still burning on the table. Michael determines to seek employment, and by accident learns that the Minister of Police is Fouche, an old schoolmate of his. With great confidence he goes to the Police Department, where he is received with joy by Fouche. As the minister is summoned to Napoleon's office he commits his secretary to find employment for Michael. "You must wander around the city and dine in the best restaurants in Paris. Every morning at nine o'clock report to me, and for this you will receive Frs. 20 per day." This is Michael's position.

In the meantime Grussac having kept his appointment, has succeeded in winning over Bernard to sign his name to a Royalist conspiracy, and quickly departs upon the entrance of Michael. Eagerly Theresa and Bernard listen to the old parson's excited snatches of talk between which he searches from pocket to pocket for the first Frs. 20 piece given him. That night, during a supper given by the conspirators, Perrin unexpectedly comes in. The conversation between Grussac and Bernard is overheard by a waiter, who immediately informs Napoleon of the plot against him. Michael, upon arriving home, sits down to prepare his report, which he hands in the next morning. The Police Department is in a state of great fear as the note of warning has safely reached Napoleon. At first no attention is paid to Michael. What, then, is the surprise and joy of Fouche and his secretary, when they read the names of the conspirators on the reverse side of Michael's report! "Citizen Perrin, you have saved the country," they tell him. Michael listens to their loud praises entirely mystified, for he is unaware that he has written his report on a compromising sheet of paper neglectfully left by Grussac. Unaware of these events, the conspirators are holding their last meeting. Bernard is appointed to execute the plot, but he refuses, and while he is struggling with his fellow conspirators, the police enter. Bernard escapes, and by Theresa immediately dispatches a letter to Fouche disclosing the plot. The two conspirators arrested are taken to the Police Department and Father Perrin is left alone to question them. "You wanted to kill Bonaparte? To become murderers? But did you think of your family, of your mother? Do you weep? Are you repentant? Then go and embrace your mother," and he lets them go free by means of a secret passage. Theresa has just delivered to Fouche Bernard's letter. When it is learned what Michael has done their dismay is boundless. All hope seems lost, when a message is given to the bewildered Michael from the conspirators. In appreciation of his leniency they have abondoned their plot and have taken advantage by leaving the country. They only express their regret that so generous a man should act the part of a spy. A spy! It is then the truth flashes upon the unsuspecting parson. His indignation is finally appeased by the diplomatic Fouche, who writes an authorization to have the old church rebuilt. Michael in his great joy forgets the incidents of his eventful day as a spy, and leaves with Theresa and Bernard, who has also been arrested, a contented man. We see him again in later years still pursuing his good and noble work as the first teacher to the little children.

BLACHE FEATURES.

HOOK AND HAND (Four parts).—The leading character, nicknamed "Hook and Hand," is a crook who operates with a hook which he had substituted for a lost left hand. "Hook" is associated in crime with Philip Sleek, a stepson of William Hartman, a banker. Hartman, the old millionaire, does not know of Philip's existence, his wife, for personal reasons, having omitted to mention him. He is a good for nothing, and for a time lives on his mother's generosity. She meets the boy secretly and does whatever she can to give him new starts in life, but all her efforts are of no avail. After "Hook" robs Hartman's establishment, at Philip's instigation, the mother, not knowing where her son had secured a big sum of money, prevails upon her husband to take his stepson into partnership, telling him that he is a cousin returned from abroad. In the meantime the crime is cleverly fastened upon Mr. Hartman's confidential secretary. This upsets the household arrangements because the secretary was to have married Mr. Hartman's adopted daughter. The story is still further complicated by "Hook and Hand's" refusal to enter into a conspiracy that would lead to the destruction of Miss Hartman. Here the clever operations of William Fox, a very crafty detective, who is engaged by Miss Hartman to unravel the mystery surrounding the accusations against her sweetheart, are productive of sensational results. A good many encounters take place between the gang and the police. The young detective finds himself in many tight places. The hero, not knowing at the last moment that he had been vindicated by a deathbed confession by "Hook and Hand," makes a spectacular escape from the officers in charge of his removal from the court to the State Penitentiary. The young man jumps from the window of a very fast moving train into the river, and thus makes an unnecessary getaway. The final scenes are full of thrill, showing the round-up of the gang and the burning of their dive, in which Miss Hartman is imprisoned and from which she is rescued by the police and Detective Fox.

VERO EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY.

THE COLOSSEUM IN FILMS (Four parts).—The Vero Educational Society has released a great original educational feature in four parts called "The Colosseum in Films." The films were made in Rome by special permission of the Italian government and according to directions by W. Stephen Bush, of The Moving Picture World. The first part consists of the exteriors, the entrances and interesting views of modern Rome taken from the upper stories of the Colosseum. We see the famous "Meta Sudante," the ancient "Sweating Corner," so named after the sweating gladiators, who after the combats in the arena retired to the "Meta Sudante" to bathe their heated bodies in its cooling mains and fountains. It was through the "Meta Sudante" that the builders of the Colosseum introduced the vast water supply into the huge edifice. Indeed the "Sweating Corner," of which various views are introduced, was part of the Colosseum itself. It stands close to the famous arch of Constantine and in its original size was many times larger than the arch itself. The next view we get is that of the famous outer wall of the Colosseum, which we see from the oldest botanical garden in the world. The order of the columns in the different stories of the building is well portrayed and we are able to distinguish after the lapse of twenty centuries some of the numbers over the entrances to the Colosseum. The picture then goes on to show the wonderful work of restoration done by the Popes of Rome from 1750 to the pontificate of the late Pope Pius IX, whose buttress at the entrance commonly used by tourists is familiar in its graceful outline to many who have seen the more popular pictures of the great theater. All the walls made of the ancient Travertine stone which was brought to Rome from Tivoli mostly by Jewish captives which the Emperor Titus brought to the eternal city after the destruction of Jerusalem show holes which it is said were made by the Vandals when they found that they were unable to destroy the Colosseum. These holes testify to the impotent rage of the barbarians. The views of Rome taken from the various stories of the Colosseum are full of panoramic beauty and historic interest. The second part shows the lower floor and the ever famous arena where so many bloody contests occurred between man and beast and more often between man and man. There are memorial tablets in honor of the Christian martyrs, who died in the arena rather than abjure their faith. The wonderful first lobby is shown with splendid detail and is a fine specimen of black and white photography. Most portions of the feature are tinted. We see the remains of the marvelous sculpture which adorned the various parts of the Colosseum from the upper stories down to the lodges of the Emperor and the Vestal Virgins. Even in its decay the heads and bodies of these columns and frescoes are surpassingly beautiful. There is also shown what remains of a mysterious fresco, said to have been brought from Jerusalem under the reign of Titus. In the left hand corner of this fresco is a strange representation of the crucifixion. Not a bit less interesting are the pictures of the stories and lodges. Every part of the auditorium proper is shown in detail and one realizes with amazement how entirely credible is the statement of the historians that not less than 80,000 spectators could be accommodated in the Colosseum and

The Colosseum in Films

These motion pictures are the first in a gala series of truly educational films entitled

THE GLORIES OF ROME

The pictures were made with special permission of the Italian Government and according to instructions of W. Stephen Bush of The Moving Picture World, who was in Rome at the time. The Vero Educational Society has purchased the negative.

Every point of interest in the immortal edifice is covered in a most entertaining way, bringing back memories of the wonderful days when 80,000 spectators looked down upon the struggles in the arena.

There are four divisions:

I. The Exterior and Entrances, together with views of Rome from different stories of the Colosseum.
II. The Lower Floor and the Arena.
III. The Stories and Lodges.
IV. What was hidden beneath the Arena.

The total length of the pictures is three thousand feet. Title and all printed matter have been prepared by Mr. Bush. The titles are full and exact, and a lecture goes with certain parts of the film. The photography is of a high standard, and portions of the films are suitably tinted. For all further information address that often there were as many as 87,000 assembled in the vast structure. We see various interesting inscriptions said to have belonged to the Imperial and the Vestal Virgin lodges, we see the remains of the incense burners, in which a solution of wine and saffron was burned in order to purify the air during the performances. The most interesting pat is perhaps the last reel showing what was hidden beneath the arena. The arena was partially removed in 1813 by the government in order to aid historic researches. The revelations made were of a most startling nature and confirmed all that had been written about the Colosseum in contemporaneous literature. We see and trace the secret passage-way which the Emperor Commodus built for himself in order to go directly from his palace into the arena; we see the niches where the gladiators waited their turn in the combats; we see the part where the Christians were confined and most interesting of all we see what provisions were made to imprison and starve into ferocity the wild beasts used in the arena. There were often as many as five thousand wild beasts of all varieties and from all countries kept in the subterranean passage-ways; hundreds of them were chained to ropes and posts along what was known as the Via Mortis (The Way of Death), through which dead or wounded gladiators were carried out. Above one of the Christian prisons is a chapel said to have been built by the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, in honor of the Christian martyrs. We see the water mains now choked up by rank vegetation through which water was introduced into the arena whenever naval spectacles were given. It would take up too much space to tell even half of the wonders of the Colosseum, but brief mention may be made of the last scenes which bear the significant titles, "Thus Passeth Away the Glory of the World." We watch the pigeons making their nests high up in the vast amphitheater and we wonder at the green lizards basking on the broken marbles.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

THE PIRATES OF THE PLAINS (Three Parts).—Joe and Jim Webster, brothers, are as different as day and night. Jim is an honest and respected rancher; Joe is the ringleader of a desperate gang of horse thieves. At the State Fair, Jim wins the championship broncho riding title of the world, for which he receives a handsome silver mounted saddle. He becomes engaged to Nell Owens, the pretty daughter of a prosperous stockman. One of Owens' post riders discovers a gang of horse thieves on the ranch and gives the alarm. Joe, their leader, breaks his saddle, and anxious to make his escape and join the thieves, takes his brother Jim's horse and heads for the Mexican border. The ranch hands give chase, hoping to overtake the rustlers before they can cross the International boundary. In a running fight, Joe kills the sheriff, but has the horse he is riding shot from under him. The posse recovers the saddle and arrests Jim for the sheriff's murder. Nell prevents his lynching and demands that he be given a trial by law. Later he is convicted on circumstantial evidence and sentenced to be hung. On the day set for the execution, Nell finds Joe mortally wounded and secures a confession from him that exonerates Jim. By much hard riding she reaches the prison yard in time to prevent Jim's death.

A WEB OF FATE (Three parts).—Joe Brandon, rancher, who has been a model husband to his Mexican wife, Rosetta, gets in hard straights and takes to gambling. In a game with a professional, Mason, he wagers a valuable gun he has borrowed from a friend. Returning home, he waits in the hills for Mason, intending to trade his horse for the lost gun. Mason refuses his request. In the rough encounter that follows, the gambler kills Brandon, but is wounded in the arm and chased by a sheriff's posse. Rosetta, returning from the grave of her husband, finds the wounded gambler and nurses him back to health. Later, suspecting him, she resolves to make him confess the murder of her husband. Panic stricken when Mason falls in a drunken stupor, Rosetta hastens away in a buckboard. She is followed in a wild ride by the sheriff and his posse, and narrowly escapes death when the buckboard overturns and rolls down a steep embankment. Fate has stepped in and Mason has reaped the whirlwind. Rosetta is cleared and devotes the rest of her life to performing acts of kindness.

MASTER BOB'S LAST RACE (Three Parts).—Two friendly bookmakers are in love with the same woman. She cares only for one of them and snubs the other. The man of her choice is lucky and wins a big stake. His former partner, who has lost his all, goes to Australia to start afresh. After a number of years he returns to Paris with a new fortune. On the eve of the classic Steeplechase, he bribes his prosperous rival's trainer to dope Master Bob, the favorite, and takes advantage of this by accepting big odds on the field. Master Bob fails to get placed in the big race, and coming down the home stretch he trips over a hurdle and breaks his leg. The jockey escapes uninjured, but the old favorite is shot. The race track enthusiasts blame Master Bob's failure on his owner and seeking vengeance, storm the jockey club and set fire to the stables. Guilty stricken, Master Bob's trainer appears at the club and exposes the man who had bribed him to cripple the favorite's chances.

WORLD FILM CORPORATION.

THE CONSPIRACY; or A $4,000,000 DOWRY (Four Parts).—The Marquis of Kermor, a nobleman of ancient lineage, is an inveterate gambler. When short of funds he calls on his friend, also his banker, the Baron of Bressieu, without troubling himself further. After a heavy loss at his club, he sends his secretary to his banker for a remittance of $50,000. The Baron of Bressieu is the living antithesis of the Marquis. He is the heartless and unscrupulous man of business. He builds up his fortune on the ruins caused by his operations. He has just launched a new gold mine, "The Golden Mine," which is expected to yield extraordinary profits—but only to the promoter, for the mine does not contain a particle of the precious metal—while doing his best to insure the success of that colossal swindle, his daughter, Sidonia, reads to him a newspaper extract, announcing the return of Count Henry, son of the Marquis, from an exploration in Africa. The girl's ambition is to become the wife of the young and brave nobleman, and with her father plans for the future, when a visit from Delrue suggests to the Baron the idea of investigating the financial standing of the Marquis. The affairs of the Marquis are in a desperate condition; his account is over-drawn to the extent of close upon $1,000,000. He has not one penny left; being in such a strait de Bressieu thinks the Marquis can refuse nothing to his creditor. On the occasion of her son's return, the Marchioness of Kermor holds a reception. De Bressieu and Sidonia have been invited and the financier seizes that opportunity to present his ultimatum to the Marquis: That the Count shall marry Sidonia and the banker will not only wipe out the paternal debt, but will give his daughter a dowry of $4,000,000. While this shameful contract is being discussed, a touching scene takes place in another room. The Marquis has for a reading-woman a young and pretty orphan, Jeanne Le Brenn, who secretly loves Henry. The young girl delicately pins on the young man's coat the red ribbon (Legion of Honor), with which the young man has just been rewarded, and he, deeply stirred by the girl's gentle act, kisses her passionately. Sidonia has seen them. Trembling with rage, she calls Delrue to one side—the man is her tool—and promises $100,000 if he manages to rid her of that rival. The Marquis begs his son to marry Sidonia. Henry refuses; but a few moments later, detecting his father in the act of committing suicide, he consents to the sacrifice and to be presented to his future bride. Jeanne Le Brenn, hidden behind a tapestry, has heard everything and falls fainting to the floor. When she comes to herself she understands she is out of place in that house where she has been so happy, writes a few words of farewell to her benefactress, and deeply grieved, leaves the house. She is unconscious of a man following—dodging her footsteps. The wretch Delrue is doing his best to earn the $100,000 promised by Sidonia.

Delrue comes up with Jeanne at the door of the unpretentious hotel where she is seeking an abode. On his recommendation, the unfortunate girl calls on a woman called Victoire, a milliner, who also manages a gambling den. After having persuaded his accomplice to pour a narcotic in Jeanne's glass, he informs Henry of the fugitive's retreat. Led by the secretary, the Count enters the gambling saloon and sees the poor child in evening dress in the midst of a strange gathering of roues and loose women. Henry, stabbed to the heart, runs away, cursing the one who has revealed to him that terrible fall. He has scarcely left the premises than the police anonymously informed by Delrue, make a raid on the place, seize the stakes and arrest the gamblers, while Delrue claims the reward of his treachery; and Sidonia exults, for she already believes herself to be the Countess of Kermor. The unhappy Henry sails for Africa, accompanied by the Great Allan, an American millionaire, in the hope of allaying his sorrow . . . of forgetting.

Alarming rumors are circulated on the exchange regarding the Golden Mine. It is whispered that the concession has never possessed the least particle of gold and everyone sells out. Sidonia imparts to her father the fears she entertains, bet De Bressieu simply smiles on; and as Delrue is announced, the financier places in a conspicuous spot on his desk the following note: "Buy all you can lay your hands on of Golden Mine on change. Buy at any price. The Golden is going up tremendously.—Baron of Bressieu."

Delrue, who has just cashed his check for $100,000, at once notices the infamous note, and thinking he is not observed, seizes it and takes it to the Marquis of Kermor. The latter, thinking he has got hold of a good thing, buys in large quantities. In two days the shares make a jump of $40. The banker's ruse is successful. Jeanne Le Brenn is taken to jail, but as nothing can be proven against her, she is discharged. Afraid of being victimized in the great city, she repairs to the house of her old nurse, in Brittany. Three months have elapsed. Henry returns to France, still accompanied by Great Allan, who has become very much attached to him. Great Allan is presented to the De Kermor family and he does not hide from the Marquis that the Golden Mine is considered nothing but a gigantic swindle. The Marquis convinced, sells out all his shares. Henry de Kermor has seen Sidonia and has asked the young girl to abandon the hope of marrying him; his heart belongs to someone else.

Great Allan knows all about Henry's love. He has seen a letter from Mme. Victoire, actually in jail, to her accomplice, asking for funds and he repairs to the prison. In exchange for bank notes, he obtains from the milliner the letter of recommendation of Delrue, the initial cause of all the catastrophes that have submerged the unfortunate Jeanne Le Brenn. In possession of those damnable papers, Allan soon runs to earth the wretch Delrue and forces him to write a full confession. The Golden Mine bubble has burst, spreading panic and ruin. The banker's dupes rush to his home and try to get hold of him. Bressieu tracked to his lair, seeks to fly. Whilst he is piling his securities in a valise, his daughter throws in the furnace all incriminating documents. In doing so she sets her clothes on fire and the house. Great Allan succeeds in discovering Jeanne's retreat, brings her back to Paris, to the Kermors, and with true American generosity, gives her a $4,000,000 dowry.

TRAFFICKERS IN SOLES (Three Parts).—Down on the old farm in Broomville, Sue and Belinda Reuben read of the delights of cabaret life and tango dancing in the great city, and forthwith resolve to taste of these delights for themselves. In the dead of night they escape from the farm, and, hiding themselves in a coal-bunker, ultimately arrive in the city. Their appearance in the main street attracts attention, and they are politely mobbed by a crowd of amused onlookers. Escaping, they explore the Great White Way, represented in the picture by some lonely suburban lots, and here they are not long in meeting the fancifully dressed "White Slavers," products of the underworld, who ply their arts so successfully that in a little while, the girls succumb to an invitation to visit the cabaret show. Here the girls fall completely in the power of their assailants, who by means of a wonderful implement, known as the injectograph, reduce them to unconsciousness. This done, they call in the assistance of the taxi-demon, who, in a fearful looking machine drawn by two mules, transports the senseless girls to the "House of Mystery," into which they are hoisted by ropes. Here they are greeted by a varied assortment of young and innocent victims, also prisoners in the house, which is presided over by a ferocious-looking Mexican.

News of the disappearance of many girls having reached the ears of the mayor, he urges the Police Dept. to get busy and clean up the city. Forthwith, Inspector McGuiness calls together his emergency squad (Jewish), while Inspector Levy gathers his heroes (Irishmen). Meanwhile, the head of the White Slave Traffic, I. Beatsall, sits in his office, counting up the gains of his "profession," which are so great that they reach him in apparently unlimited amounts, and are secured by large safes. This man is subsequently run to earth, and hauled off to the police station to meet the punishment he deserves.

The squads, having gone on the warpath, some of the guardians of law and order indulge, in the meantime, in a little cabaretting on their own account. Being caught in the act, they are arrested and taken to the police station, presided over by the Cheese of Police. Here no reports from the squads having been received, Levy and McGuiness, disguise themselves as widows, for the purpose of obtaining evidence. By their disguises, they succeed in obtaining admission to the House of Mystery. Revealing themselves to the inmates, they allay their fears. The house is raided and the inmates taken away in a patrol. Sue and Belinda are restored to their father, and Levy and McGuiness are duly rewarded for their labors by the present of a ham for one and a turkey for the other.

THE DIVINE APPEAL; or THE LION TAMER'S REVENGE (Three Parts).—Armand Delcroix receives a visit from a fellow-artist, who invites him to a fare, where they meet Mabel, a fashionable artist's model. They, in company with a gay crowd of students and models, go and see a sensational performance—a young girl, Clarice, performing in an animal lioness's cage. At first all goes well, but suddenly the crowd is horrified to see the lioness make a vicious attack on her. Delcroix rushes into the cage and rescues Clarice. A week after this event Delcroix calls at the menagerie. He finds Clarice none the worse for her ordeal, and offers to paint her portrait. The inevitable happens. They fall in love with each other.

The artists' annual ball takes place shortly afterwards. Delcroix is invited, and he takes Clarice with him. In the supper room, Clarice comes upon her lover, Delcroix, with Mabel in his arms. She rushes home, broken-hearted.

Scalieri, a friend of Mabel's, picks a quarrel with Delcroix. A duel is fought, in which Delcroix is seriously wounded. Clarice forgets her anger and goes to nurse him.

A few months later Delcroix meets Mabel in the park. She persuades him to accompany her. Clarice sees the pair drive off. In despair she rushes to the river, but when she contemplates its murky depths, her gentle soul revolts at the idea of suicide, and she drags herself home to pine and die; her last thoughts being for the man who has brought her to an untimely grave. Mabel reigns supreme in Delcroix's affections, and poor, unfortunate Clarice is forgotten.

Years roll by and Delcroix prospers. He has a daughter named Vyvienne. Barthus, Clarice's father, is still alive and comes to the Neuilly fair with his lions. There he chances upon Delcroix. He plans a horrible revenge. One night he and his men drag the heavy cages with the roaring lions to Delcroix's country house. The doors are opened and the lions let loose in the grounds.

Madame Delcroix happens to have a social engagement that evening and Delcroix stays at home with Vyvienne. She goes to bed, and Delcroix retires to his study. Suddenly the roar of the famished lions reached his ears. Horrified, he rushes upstairs and sees the lions entering his daughter's room. He dashes quickly into the room and rescues Vyvienne, just as one of the lions is in the act of springing into her cot, But the infuriated beasts do not intend to be so easily balked of their prey. They give chase and there is a fearful race for life. Barthus, waiting and listening outside, sees a vision of his daughter imploring his mercy. He relents and enters the villa, mastering the lions just as Delcroix collapses with his daughter in his arms.

FEATURES IDEAL.

AN UNKNOWN MONSTER (Three Parts).—In the opening scenes we are introduced to Azucena, the ward of Count Altumara, with whom the count's son, Dr. Altumara, is in love. She does not reciprocate his affection, but later, yielding to the count's entreaties, she consents to marry him. After the marriage she refuses to live with her husband, and goes away alone to a country house of the count's. Here, one day, in an old escritoire, she comes upon a written confession relating to the late Countess Altumara, from which she learns that the countess betrayed her husband, and that when her husband discovered the intrigue, the child, whom up to then he had believed to be his own, was immediately banished from his house. A little later, Azucena, questioning the old man-servant at the castle, learns the details of the story, and all the thrilling scenes of that long-hidden romance are flashed upon the screen before us.

Upon being pressed to do so, the old servant, with obvious reluctance, discloses the whereabouts of Fifi, her husband's unknown brother, who has been brought up by Beppo, a woodman, in ignorance of his parentage. The next day, Azucena visits the woodman's cottage, and learns that Fifi is a profligate; nevertheless, she instructs him to call upon her.

She is also startled at the remarkable resemblance he bears to her husband, this inspires her with an idea for injuring the man whose name she bears, and whose only crime is that he loves her. Thereupon, she promises Fifi ample funds if he will obey her implicitly, which he agrees to do, and ordering him some suitable apparel, she determines to take him into society with her. That evening she is going to a party, and Fifi accompanies her. He is naturally taken for his brother, but his eccentric manner and questionable behaviour somewhat astonish the guests. He cannot restrain his thieving propensities, and to her horror, Azucena sees him appropriating a banknote from the pocketbook of one of the guests.

A little terrified at the success of her plan, she slips away without her companion. Some hours later, Fifi visits a tavern, in a poor quarter of the town, and in an altercation with one of his companions, deals him a fatal blow. In the confusion which follows, the unprincipled Fifi manages to make his escape.

Meanwhile, his profligate brother enters the count's house, and declaring he is his son, demands money from the surprised nobleman. Not meeting with any response to this demand, Fifi proceeds to help himself from the count's desk, and when the indignant owner seeks to restrain him, with a fierce gesture, he hurls him to the ground. The unprincipled Fifi then leaves the house, and the man-servant, believing him to be his brother, is somewhat perturbed at his unusual demeanor. He immediately goes in search of the count, and finds him unconscious on the floor. The count dies without disclosing the name of the assailant, and his younger son, the doctor, is accused of having caused his death, and taken into custody.

Shortly afterwards the real culprit is discovered, and in a damatic scene, the brothers stand face to face and the innocence of the younger brother is established.

THE GREAT MINE DISASTER (Four Parts—Release Mar. 1).—Walter Preston, a mine owner, learns that a strike has been declared by his miners. His manager, Jack Hamilton, takes rigid steps, and discharges the ringleaders, which proves an effective method of settling the strike. But the discharged miners plan to be revenged on the manager. Hamilton calls on the mine owner's daughter, Dora. While there, Preston shows him a letter from Frank Conway, a mining engineer, who applies for a position. On his way home he is waylaid by the two miners whom he had discharged. They murderously attack him, but assistance comes unexpectedly. Frank Conway chances to see the attack and puts the ruffians to flight. This act places him in good favor with the manager, who rewards him with the position he applied for.

Soon after, Conway meets the manager, who is strolling with the mine owner and his daughter. Hamilton introduces him and tells of his brave act. The manager and the miner owner go off to discuss some new project, leaving Conway and the girl together. Dora's charming personality makes a profound impression on the young engineer, who is quite smitten with her. On the return of the two men, Preston gives Conway an invitation to a dance, and during the temporary absence of his daughter and the manager, explains that they are engaged. This is bad news for Conway. Dora is strangely drawn to the handsome young engineer, and at the dance that evening, Hamilton's suspicions are aroused by seeing them constantly together.

The next day the manager and his fiancee go for a ride and meet Conway on the road. Dora's horse, being frightened by a passing auto, runs away with her. Conway immediately rides after them and after a spectacular chase, succeeds in rescuing the girl, who faints. Picking her up in his arms, Conway is overcome by his love and rapturously kisses her. He realizes then that his love for her is hopeless, and informs the mine owner by letter that he would have to leave his employ the next day, promising to explain the reason on his return home. Preston shows the letter to the manager. Dora hears them discussing it and demands to see the letter. Hamilton shows it to her and is staggered when he realizes by her actions that the young engineer has replaced him in her affections.

A terrific explosion occurs in the mine the next day, and while many men are rescued, Conway is reported to be lost in the mine. Hamilton, exhausted by the work of rescue, decides to make a last attempt to find his rival, owing to the pleadings of Dora. Buckling on an oxygen tank, he plunges again into the darkness and danger of the pit, and after many hardships, finds the missing man unconscious. Taking off his oxygen tank and placing it on Conway, he soon revives the unconscious man. But Hamilton is then overcome by the deadly mine gases, and is carried to the surface by the man whom he had aided. His brave deed proves fatal, however, and the heroic manager, after uniting the hands of the girl whom he loved and those of his rival, passes into the Great Beyond.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

THE PRIDE OF JENNICO (Four Parts).—In the days of Romance when fortune and glory were carved by the sword Basil Jennico, the descendant of a proud and haughty house, walking among the old ancestral chambers, dreams of his gallant forebears and their daring deeds performed for the smile of a lady fair. Inspired by his lofty heritage and the atmosphere of nobility and bravery in which he has been reared, Basil longs for love and adventure. At this romantic period of Basil's life, his aged uncle, the lineal head of his house, dies, and makes Basil swear by the sword that he will always uphold the pride of Jennico. Basil becomes Lord of Tollendhall and master of the broad acres of the Duchy of Lausitz, but titles, estates and splendor do not compensate for the absence of love.

Princess Ottilie, a beautiful, whimsical maiden, is urged by her guardian, the Earl of Dornheim, to marry Prince Eugen, a worthless rogue, whom Ottilie fears and loathes. To avoid marrying Eugen, the Princess effects her escape from the castle in the guise of her maid, Marie, who follows after her mistress. The two are overtaken by a storm and seek the shelter of Jennico Castle.

Marie is introduced to Jennico as the Princess, but Jennico falls madly in love with Ottilie, whom he believes to be the maid. Love and pride struggle for supremacy. Jennico is heart-broken, because his sworn duty to maintain the dignity of his house prohibits his marriage to the maid. The wilful, fascinating maid intimates to Jennico that the Princess admires him, and, repressing love for duty, he courts the "princess." The marriage is arranged. Princess Ottilie and her maid confer and arrange to change places at the altar. Jennico greets his bride, heavily veiled, but when at last he looks upon her face he sees the piquant, mocking Ottilie and thinks he has married the maid. Love bids him accept his happiness, but his pride asserts itself and he resents the supposed deception. Ottilie, noticing his anger and piqued because he is not content with her, regardless of her apparent low rank, leaves him.

Desperate for the love of the absent and tantalizing beauty, he seeks the supposed maid, encounters the bitter enmity and jealousy of the defeated Prince Eugen and his trusted force; but, despite all opposition and against all odds, he wins his way to Ottilie's heart at his sword's point—to find that valor has not only won him a heart of gold, but a title that adds lustre to the pride of Jennico.

BALBOA FEATURE FILMS.

SACRIFICIAL FIRES (Three parts).—Dick Mathews is left penniless through the death of his father and his friends shun him. He secures a position as representative of an American mercantile firm and goes to Japan. One day when calling on a Japanese of integrity to purchase some antique article, he meets the man's daughter, Cherryblossom. Dick is impressed by her beauty, and later asks the girl to marry him. She does so. Dick buys and funishes a pretty little American house and instructs her in American ways.

About six months after their marriage Dick receives a letter from his home in San Francisco, informing him an uncle has died, leaving him his entire fortune and that his presence is desired at once. He prepares to leave. He tells Cherryblossom he is called to America on business, but will return in a month or so. She asks to go along, but he refuses. She is dazed and heartbroken by his sudden departure.

Months go by and his letters grow less fervent and less frequent and then they cease entirely. In the meantime Dick, back among his old friends, forgets his wife. He meets a beautiful American girl and falls in love with her, but his manhood keeps him from telling her of his love. Yet every time as he starts to write Cherryblossom something prevents him. Cherrybloom determines to go to America to find him. Arriving in San Francisco she discovers him in company with Helen Morrow and realizing the situation, returns to Japan without revealing her presence to Dick. She writes a cablegram the moment of her return to Japan. She takes off her American attire and puts on her Japanese kimono. She takes an American flag and wraps it about her body. Taking up a little jeweled dagger, she goes to the windows which open out on the sea. Dick becomes remorseful and, realizing his duty to Cherryblossom, writes her a letter, in which he tells her he will return to her. Just as he is about to mail it, a messenger delivers a cablegram which informs Dick that Cherrybloom died that morning. Dick slowly burns the letter he had written her, and, clasping the picture of Helen to his breast, buries his head in his arms.

THE UNEXPECTED (Three parts).—Dorothy Madison, a secret service operative, is sent into the West Virginia mountains to locate a still, after male operatives failed. She carries a sketching outfit and a carrier pigeon into the moonshine country, and hides the pigeon in the woods near a mountain cabin, where she hopes to make headquarters. She walks along the road until she sees Dave Parks coming, falls, feigns a sprained ankle, and is taken home by Dave, who is a young, good-looking moonshiner. Dave's mother is a sour-faced, pipe-smoking, suspicious old mountain woman, and only tolerates Dorothy. Nell Oatsey, typical mountain girl of bold beauty, hears of Dorothy's plight and goes to see her. She carries her rifle. Dorothy is in the woods near the road sketching and looking about for signs of a still. Nell sees her and approaches. Dorothy is sitting on a log back of which is a big rattlesnake ready to spring. Nell shoots the snake and saves Dorothy from being bitten, but nearly scares her to death.

Dave Parks, who is Nell's sweetheart, is smitten with Dorothy and grows cold toward Nell, which increases his mother's antipathy for Dorothy. By climbing a tree and using a spyglass Dorothy discovers the still and how it is guarded. She sends the information by her carrier pigeon and arranges for a signal to raid. At the appointed time she takes Dave to the woods to sketch him, and he is her unconscious tool in arranging the signal, which is seen from a nearby hill by the secret service men. The moonshine plant is raided and Dave, who is on his way to the place, runs afoul of a secret service guard and both shoot and both are wounded. Dorothy, who has followed Dave, desires to save him from prison and goes to his aid, helping him home. He is not badly hurt and is hidden in a woodshed. After dark Dorothy helps him away and takes him home. Next day Nell Oatsey on her way to market learns that Dave and Dorothy have disappeared. She believes Dorothy has stolen Dave from her and starts on a mission to kil lDorothy. She reaches Dorothy's home the next day and enters the library, where Dorothy and Dave are talking. She tries to shoot Dorothy, but Dave spoils her aim. She accuses Dorothy, who for the first time is found to be the wife of an operative and the mother of a beautiful three-year-old child. Dorothy's husband appears, the child follows and all is explained, Dorothy making it plain that she saves Dave because Nell had killed the snake that menaced her. She reunites Dave and Nell.

MIDGAR FEATURES.

LIFE'S TEMPTATIONS (Imperator film—4 parts).—The picture opens with a vivid representation of the wreck of the steamship "Teutonia." The only survivors of the catastrophe are Walter Mason and James Ford. They succeed in gaining partial security by reaching a portion of the wreckage, on which they float for several hours. Weakened by exposure and thinking his end to be near, Walter Mason tells his companion how he came to be a passenger on the ill-fated steamer.

Mason tells Ford that prior to going on board the "Teutonia," he was steward to the Earl of Westchester. The Earl was forced to sell his estate to his brother-in-law, Sir William Scott. After the sale had been completed and the money handed over, Mason was driving the Earl home when on the side of a very steep embankment, Mason and the Earl alighted to adjust the harness and by accident the Earl was precipitated to the bottom of the cliff. Frightened of being accused of murder, Mason took the Earl's pocketbook containing the money obtained by the Earl from his brother-in-law and took flight and boarded the ship which had since gone down. Almost with his last gasp, Mason hands to Ford the money he took from the Earl, imploring him to return it to the Earl's daughter. Shortly afterward, a huge wave sweeps his exhausted body from the raft, and Ford is left alone with $100,000 in his possession. The next morning Ford is rescued by two fishermen and later makes his way to Westchester for the purpose of returning the money to its rightful owner.

Since the escape of Mason, Sir William Scott has adopted his niece and is now in financial difficulties and anxious to sell the estate he purchased from the Earl. The inn-keeper of Westchester, thinking Ford is a possible purchaser of the estate of Westchester, introduces him as such to Lady Phyllis. Enamored of Lady Phyllis, Ford's good intentions weaken and instead of returning to her the money, he purchases the estate. Shortly afterward, Ford is married to Lady Phyllis.

Eight years later, coal is discovered on Ford's estate and he is very prosperous. He is still doubtful of Walter Mason's fate and writes a letter to the steamship company, asking them if they know anything definite of the fate of Mason. By a curious coincidence, Ford's letter finds its way to Walter Mason himself. This comes about by the fact that Mason was picked up by a passing steamer and eventually obtained a position in the offices of the steamship company. Although his memory of the events preceding and immediately following the wreck of the "Teutonia" is very hazy and he finds it practically impossible to reconstruct events, like a flash Ford's letter brings back to him all the circumstances of the disaster.

He hastens to his old home at Westchester and calls on Lady Phyllis. While he is explaining to her the circumstances, James Ford walks in and is dumbfounded at the sight of Mason. Phyllis explains to her husband what she has already learned and realizing his wife knows the awful truth, he decides to leave her forever. He writes her a note, telling her of his intentions and proceeds to the mines in order to give final instructions to his engineers there. While doing this, news is brought to him of a terrible explosion in the mines. He rushes to the scene of the disaster and at the pit head is joined by Lady Phyllis. They are informed that their little son is in the burning shaft and Ford immediately goes down the shaft to rescue his son. After braving innumerable dangers searching for the little boy, the father at last discovers him and a few seconds later staggers forth with the boy in his arms.

The father's heroic act and his great remorse for his previous dishonesty so softens Phyllis that a reconciliation takes place at the pit head and after the injuries of the father and son have been attended to, the family is once more united.

The Day and Night Screens, Inc., New York City. December 20th, 1913.

Gentlemen:—We beg to advise you that we have installed the Day and Night Screen which we purchased from you for our new Plaza Theatre in New Orleans, which was opened to the public Saturday, December 6th, at noon.

We are operating ten of the most high class moving picture theatres in this part of the country, in every one of which we have a very fine screen, but we must say that the Day and Night Screen in the new Plaza outshines anything we have ever used.

We cannot find words to express how greatly pleased we are with the results obtained from this screen. We believe you have reached in this article a screen that is perfect, and which will revolutionize theatre screens.

As you know, we are now building another big moving picture theatre in Pensacola, Fla., and you may rest assured it will be a Day and Night Screen in this house. With best wishes for your continued success, we remain

WHG/D Very truly yours, (Signed) W. H. GUERINGER, General Manager.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills

Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

New Majestic Turns Out Its Best Political Drama In "The Reform Candidate" (3 reels) and You Ought to Get It!

This feature, the regular release of Sunday, Feb. 22, will appeal to everyone simply because the reform element in every community is the largest element nowadays, and they will all be interested in the story of a reform candidate, who fights the corruptionists hard. But they almost drive him to the wall, as political rings have in other cases, only to meet downfall in the end. Still, it is an age of reform, and to-day it goes hard with rings usually. That's where "The Reform Candidate" is popular. There's a great love story interwoven, and the Candidate is saved in the finals because his wife could wear a messenger boy's suit. With Lamar Johnstone and Francelia Billington in the "leads." No release on the following release day, Tuesday, Feb. 24, because of extra-reel subject of preceding release day. Since "Star of Bethlehem" There Has Been No Cruze-La Badie Picture So Important as "Cardinal Richelieu's Ward"

With James Cruze as Richelieu and Flo La Badie as Julie De Mortemar—the Ward—you see these sterling artists in their best joint effort to date. The stars of "Star of Bethlehem" were especially reunited for this "Big Production" so that YOU COULD CROWD YOUR HOUSE. There is no use to print tons of description of "CARDINAL RICHELIEU'S WARD," for the very fact that it IS a "Big Production" should guarantee its worth. Remember, though, that it was first of the big 'uns to be produced in its entirety in the great new Thanhouser Studio. Remember, for advertising purposes, the splendid cast: Cruze, La Badie, Chester, Foster, Barnes, Bower and Gane. Remember to see that nearest Continental or Mutual office for the attractive arrangement that gives you for exclusive first-run use for a full year in your locality. Absolute protection is yours under this system. No more advertising a feature heavily to learn the fellow down the street is going to get it, too. All in four reels and all BIG in story, cast and settings.

For March---"RICHELIEU," with James Cruze and Flo La Badie

THANHOUSER THREE-A-WEEK

Sunday, March 1st—"THE SCIENTIST'S DOLL" features Mignon Anderson as the Doll—and a little doll she is, in opinion of countless admirers! Imagine Harry Benham as a devil. Well, he's one for a while in this comedy, which Riley Chamberlin helps put in the hit column.

Tuesday, March 3rd—"THE DESERT TRIBESMAN," TWO REELS, gives James Cruze as the Tribesman and as his own father, the Caliph—a protean performance! David Thompson, as the Samaritan, schemes against the Caliph's life and almost loses his own. It's a mighty thrilling story. Carey L. Hastings and Little Leland Benham have popular parts. The Thanhouser Zoo contributes the camel atmosphere.

Friday, March 6th—NO RELEASE, because of two-reeler of preceding release day.

Best Thriller Ever Produced by OTIS TURNER

When we tell you that "Won in the Clouds" is the best thriller Otis Turner ever produced we are making a statement that ought to make you THINK, for he has produced some of the master thrillers of the age. We unqualifiedly assert that "Won in the Clouds" is

A greater feature than "CAPTAIN KIDD"
A greater feature than "ROBINSON CRUSOE"
A greater feature than "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN"
A greater feature than "UNDER THE BLACK FLAG"
A greater feature than "THE GREAT GANTON MYSTERY"
A greater feature than "IN SLAVERY DAYS"
A greater feature than "THE BUCCANEERS"
A greater feature than "SHERIDAN'S RIDE"
A greater feature than "SHON THE PIPER"
A greater feature than "THE DIAMOND MAKERS"
A greater feature than "CAPTAIN JENNY, S. A."

All of which were directed by Mr. Turner! Book "Won in the Clouds" NOW! Start to advertise it NOW! Pay the extra price that your exchange will ask and then thank Heaven that you are a Universal exhibitor and can get first chance at such a feature as this!

FEATURING HERBERT RAWLINSON AND MARIE WOLCAMP

Three Reels of Sensation! Three Reels of AIRSHIPS, LIONS, ELEPHANTS, JUNGLE FIGHTS and SAVAGES! A sure thriller from main title to tail-piece. Ending with a situation totally different from any ever used in a picture—a battle from an airship with savages, closing with the blowing up of the whole savage village with lyddite bombs dropped from the airship!

It's Another Universal Special and of course it's going to cost you more than the regular price to book it. WE HAD TO GO TO AN ENORMOUS EXPENSE to engage the KNABENSHUE DIRIGIBLE BALLOON FOR THIS PICTURE, but the result is well worth the big money it cost. Don't quibble with your exchange about price. GO TO IT WITH ALL YOUR MIGHT, AND YOU'LL PACK AND JAM YOUR HOUSE. The people will never quit talking about it.

Ready the Middle of March!

Manufacturing Concern in the Universe"

UNIVERSAL MOVING PICTURES

A Universal

greeted the startling

has joined

Telegrams, cablegrams and letters have been pouring in upon us ever since we announced the big news. But, better still, EXHIBITORS ARE FLOCKING TO UNIVERSAL EXCHANGES AND CONTRACTING FOR THAT UNIVERSAL PROGRAM! They are at last awakening to the fact that no power on earth can check the wonderful progress of the largest film manufacturing concern in the universe!

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 19th.
Within two hours after receipt of news concerning Ford Sterling, signed two hundred and sixty dollars new business in Denver alone effective after first release. More coming. All the flowery eloquent expressions we might make of how pleased we are and etc., don't compare with the sweet music of exhibitors signing new contracts. Congratulations and again congratulations. Universal now positively invincible.
H. T. Nolan,
Wm. H. Swanson Film Co.

New York, Feb. 19th.
The big news regarding Ford Sterling and others received, local exhibitors tickled to death gottohandittoyou.
E. M. Saunders,
New York Exchange.

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 19th.
Greatest move Universal has ever made in securing services of Ford Sterling, Keystone Company. Accept my congratulations. This will boom business. We look for big increase.
Anti-Trust Film Co.

San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 19th.
Accept our congratulations in securing Keystone Company. Following letter addressed to exhibitors: "More news. The Universal Film Mfg. Co. continue doing it! Doing what? Breaking the back of their competition. Here is the latest have just received. Practically the entire Keystone Company secured. Fred J. Balshofer, original organizer of the New York Motion Picture Co., has resigned and organized new company with Ford Sterling, Keystone comedian; Henry Pathe Lehrman, writer and director of Keystone comedies; Robert Thornby, and others. Look for this famous comedy in the Universal program. This addition puts the Universal program in the lead of all programs."
California Film Exchange

Fort Smith, Ark., Feb. 20th.
Every little bit added to what you've got makes just a little bit more. So we welcome ye Keystone comedians, directors, etc. With the other ten per cent. of the business it will be all the name Universal implies with us in the State of Arkansas.
Universal Film & Supply Co.

Dallas, Texas, Feb. 18th.
We cannot find words suitable to sufficiently congratulate you for securing Ford Sterling, Henry Pathe Lehrman, Robert Thornby and Fred Balshofer to produce comedies for your program. Sterling is terrifically popular here as everywhere and Texas exhibitors will stagger when they learn of your latest scoop. We are too happy to say more except that all Universal exhibitors are bound to sing your praise for evermore
Consolidated Film & Supply Co.

Minneapolis, Minn., Feb. 18th.
Received day letter informing us of New Universal Comedies to be released under former Keystone directors and cast. This biggest scoop ever put over in history motion picture industry. Too much praise cannot be given Universal and its ever wideawake officers. Extend best wishes to members new company. Heartiest congratulations.
Laemmle Film Service.

Pittsburg, Pa., Feb. 18th.
Telegram announcing that you have secured Keystone stars received. This is the greatest scoop ever made in the history of the film business. Accept our heartiest congratulations; success is bound to be yours.
Independent Film Exchange.

Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 18th.
Telegram in reference to Ford Sterling just received. It is no surprise as we knew you would get them eventually as they used the brains God gave them. Nothing you do could surprise us as we have become immune. The best is none too good for the Universal.
Interstate Films Company.

Cleveland, O., Feb. 18th.
Our sincerest congratulations to you for securing the Keystone Comedy Company. As for our part we will make all the noise the air can hold.
Victor Film Service.

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 19th.
You are certainly to be congratulated on what will go down on record as one of the most wonderful achievements accomplished by the Universal Company, to erect a business equal to the high character of the other companies, and to surpass in every point possible was a matter of course, a policy characteristic of the Universal Company. After we advertise this among our customers as well as to others, we feel confident to any that this your latest scoop will make all who had doubts about the Universal program realize that now the Universal leads and others follow.
Laemmle Film Service Co.

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 19th.
Allow us to congratulate you on your success in securing Sterling and his associates from the Keystone Company. Our solicitors and road men have been battling for months to find something to compete with the Keystone comedies, which has been our main trouble in securing new business. We feel safe now in saying with this new addition that the Universal is the strongest program on earth.
Standard Film Exchange.

Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 19th.
Heartiest congratulations in achieving comedy company. Most assuredly it will be an eye opener for exhibitors who do not use Universal Program. Anticipate that some exhibitors will pay an extra premium to obtain our program. Mailing circular letters to all exhibitors in our territory. Sincere well wishes for its future success.
Philadelphia Film Exchange.
Michael Lessy, Mgr.

Minneapolis, Minn., Feb. 19th.
Was fortunate in being in Laemmle Film Service Minneapolis office when day letter arrived announcing latest acquisition to big U. Organization. As exhibitor using Universal Program in two houses at LaCrosse, Wis. I realize what Keystone players and directors will mean to exhibitors and picture patrons. Success to your organization.
H. H. Burford, Pres. Wis. State Branch No. 8, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Buffalo, N. Y., Feb. 19th.
Your acquisition of Keystone Company will be one of the strongest boosts to the Universal Program. Exhibitors are already showing great interest. Accept our congratulations.
Victor Film Service.

Spokane, Wash., Feb. 18th.
Universal Film Mfg. Co.:
Just received the glad tidings and congratulate you on your master stroke in securing the Keystone organization, showing to exhibitors all over the United States that the Universal Film Mfg. Co. is willing to spend unlimited money in order to give all Universal exhibitors the best program that money can buy. We have notified by wire all of our customers of the new addition to our program, and you can place our standing order for one copy of each release of the new brand for both our Seattle and Portland offices.

your stupendous success has swept us off our feet. Your securing the Keystone Company is a glorious victory for the Universal and its significance cannot be measured. You have our sincerest appreciation and that of every exhibitor in our territory. We hope that the marvelously progressive methods of the Universal will bring many other such surprises. With this new strength added to your already magnificent force the Universal Program will have no peer in all the world. A thousand congratulations.

Wm. Oldknow,
Consolidated Film & Supply Co.

Detroit, Mich., Feb. 18th
Accept our heartiest congratulations on securing practically all Keystone comedy company. We assure you that by including this with our already unsurpassed program we can offer our customers a service that has not and never will have an equal.

A. W. Blankmeyer, Mgr.,
Detroit Universal Film Co.

Baltimore, Md., Feb. 18th.
Your telegram received in regard to the big scoop in taking over Keystone company with Ford Sterling, Henry Pathe Lehrman and Robert Thornby. This is certainly a feature in the Universal camp. Keep up the good work. I also wish to take this opportunity to congratulate you on the extra fine pictures that your company has been turning out lately. I am convinced that you will get the appreciation of every exchangeman and exhibitor throughout the country in regard to the above. Wishing you the best of luck and hoping to see in the near future every theatre using Universal Service. I remain,

P. Oletsky, Mgr.,
Baltimore Film Exchange.

Oklahoma City, Okla., Feb. 18th.
Congratulations for securing Keystone comedy force. With them added to the Universal's present magnificent array it places us absolutely supreme and leaves nothing for the opposition except vain regrets. While we are already far above our nearest competitors, this additional good news will make us invincible and we are confident that new business will soon be taxing our fullest capacity. Hurrah for Universal.

Universal F. & S. Co
R. C. Cropper,

Washington, D. C., Feb. 18th.
With the new addition of the stars as mentioned in your day letter, exhibitors should begin to realize that you stop at nothing to improve the already best program on the market. We know your efforts are in the right direction and there isn't anything you can do that will surprise us. The exhibitor that can't use that Universal Program isn't worthy of it. More power to you all.

Washington Film Exchange

Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 18th
Heartiest congratulations on acquisition of Ford Sterling comedies to Universal Program. This company, headed by Messrs. Balshofer, Thornby, Lehrman, of Keystone Company, will shake the world with their mirthful screen interpretations.

Universal F. & S. Co.
W. A. Calkins.

Wilkes-Barre, Pa., Feb. 18th.
Enthusiastic congratulations on securing the Keystone comedy company. Universal now stands alone.

Exhibitors' Film Exchange.

Indianapolis, Ind., Feb. 18th.
Accept heartiest congratulations on your wonderful aggressiveness in adding to the Universal Program the stars of former Keystone comedies. Place our standing order for all these releases. The demand for Universal Program is now greater than the supply. The addition of Sterling is a masterstroke.

Central Film Service Co.

Montreal, Que., Feb. 18th
Wow, Wow, Wow. This ought to convince the doubters that the UNIVERSAL is as good as its word. You said you would produce the best comedies in the world. Well, Ford Sterling comedies look good to us. Makes competitors look like back numbers.

Canadian Film Co.

Omaha, Neb., Feb. 18th
Received joyful news 5:57 p.m. regarding prominent factors Keystone comedy company entering Universal ranks. At 8 p.m. have news on press and by to-morrow noon all motion picture theatres in our territory will be in possession of the facts. Accept hearty congratulations on behalf of employees this exchange who feel it is the greatest progressive step taken thus far by Universal.

Laemmle Film Service,
George A. Rogers, Asst. Mgr.

New York, Feb. 18th
Heartiest congratulations to you and a hearty welcome to Messrs. Sterling, Lehrman, Thornby, and Balshofer. Your latest coup d' etat has been received with great enthusiasm and joy. Not surprised however, as this quite consistent with your policy throughout.

M. H. Hoffman, Mgr.

Calgary, Alta., Feb. 18th
Heartiest congratulations on your latest coup d' etat getting the Keystone company. This is in line with the Universal policy in making Universal films the best in the world. Western Canadian exhibitors unite with ourselves in assuring the Universal of their continued support of the Universal's progressive policy.

Canadian Film Exchange,
H. J. Allen.

New Orleans, La., Feb. 18th
Your wonderful news just received. The acquisition of Messrs. Ford Sterling, Henry Pathe Lehrman, Robert Thornby, First Balshofer, is the greatest beat in the film game in a decade and proves conclusively that the Universal Film Manufacturing Co is determined to secure the best talent in the world regardless of salaries paid and all. Universal exhibitors to-day can consider themselves mighty fortunate mortals. Our enthusiasm is unbounded, knowing we have such wonderful aggressive men at our head.

Consolidated Film Exchange
A. G. Shear, Mgr.,

Boston, Mass., Feb. 19th.
My vocabulary is too limited to properly express to you my extreme gratification upon learning of your latest coup in securing the backbone of the Keystone Company, Ford Sterling and others. You are certainly looking after the interest of the exhibitors first, last and all the time, and seem bound to give them the best of every branch no matter at what cost.

N. E. Universal Film Co.,
J. A. Eslow, Mgr.

For Release Tuesday, March 17th, 1914

Fascinated by the charms of Mada, a beautiful gypsy, Jack Barrett deserts his family and friends and becomes a member of the wandering band with which she is traveling about the country. His aged parents and their foster daughter, Louise, to whom Jack has been engaged almost since childhood, are heartbroken.

When Jack's money has disappeared, he finds that Mada no longer looks upon him with favorable eyes. To replenish his purse, he allows himself to be persuaded to assist in the burglary of a country house, which, he later discovers, is the property of his own father and mother.

Louise, awakening, hears the intruders at work in the house, and is horrified to see that one of them is her own beloved Jack. The next day, when she refuses to aid the detectives in solving the mystery, she is placed under arrest as a party to the burglary. Jack, who has been again turned adrift by Mada after she has taken from him the fruits of his crime, reads of the charges against Louise and returns home to clear her by a full confession. The father forgives the prodigal, and Jack, having learned his lesson well, finds peace and happiness in the love of the faithful Louise.

Facts and Comments

FOR some time we have been watching for the recrudescence of our old friend the "good boy" who has been turned into a "villain" and a criminal by looking at too many crimes on the screen. We were just beginning to wonder what had happened to the law of averages when the long overdue phenomenon reappeared in the columns of our esteemed daily contemporaries. It is reported that a young man who sang in the choir of a church had been induced to lead a double life by reason of seeing so many successful burglaries and robberies on the screen. There can be no doubt of this because the young man himself says it. Strange to say, however, our contemporaries now doubt and belittle the claim of the erring youth that his fall was due to motion pictures. The New York World, which but a year ago traced most of the juvenile crime to the influence of the wicked motion pictures, now scoffs at the idea of this particular youth being corrupted in this way. After all, common sense is asserting itself and the rabid prejudice against the motion picture is even disappearing from the columns of the yellow press.

THE Italian government, in imposing a special duty on kinema shows, exempts therefrom all places where educational pictures are being shown exclusively. As far as we know, this is the first instance of any official and practical recognition of the educational value of the motion picture. The Italian government does evidently not believe in taxing education. In view of the fact that almost every motion picture entertainment contains educative values, there ought to be no tax on motion pictures except through pressing necessity of raising revenue. Every tax on motion pictures of any kind is more or less in the nature of a tax on education.

AN exhibitor writing to us from a fair-sized city in Kansas complains of the license with which a newspaper in his locality is conducted. He incloses a clipping from the paper giving a circumstantial account of attempts on a woman's honor. The details are revolting and in no way necessary to a fair and intelligible report. The newspapers have the constitutional right to print a fair report of any proceedings in a court of justice, but this particular paper plainly abuses the privilege. Very aptly our correspondent points out that a picture which would attempt to spread the disgusting story on the screen would in all probability be summarily suppressed. We have emphasized the unfairness of a dual standard of decency for the paper and for the picture. We have no doubt whatever that the article in question would upon complaint before the proper authorities bar this newspaper from the mails. As the paper is in favor of censorship, it would be well for somebody in the Kansas town to give it a taste of its own medicine.

IT is not to be supposed that the kinematographic news service will ever supplant the printed news service, but there can be no doubt that news in motion pictures will hereafter form not the least important channel through which the world will be informed of what is going on. The proposed "combination service" of motion pictures and printed news is but the forerunner of huge enterprises that are to come in the future. In the swiftness of transmission, whether by individual local reporters or by the telegraph or telephone, the present method of collecting and presenting news will continue to be superior to all other methods, but in point of absolute accuracy the kinematographic reporter will be unapproachable. Even now we know that the kinematographic news service is far the most popular. It is not at all organized or systematized, but largely haphazard and depending on chance far more often than on schedule. In spite of these handicaps, which no newspaper could survive for more than a week, the kinematographic news service has sprung into instant favor, and the public apparently cannot get enough of it. The power of the press will be increased a thousand-fold once we have a well-organized and effective national and international kinematographic news service.

ROYALTY continues to be interested in motion pictures. The latest cables bring the interesting information that Prince Henry of Prussia is taking lessons in camera work before going on an important scientific tour of exploration in the South American countries. Just as much as here the motion picture is gaining friends in the highest circles of Europe, and the ancient delusion that the motion picture is essentially a pleasure for the poorest classes is dying off. This delusion has been a great hindrance to the full development of all the glorious possibilities of the kinematograph. As one of the influences which have always worked for quality, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD takes pleasure in every indication that the motion picture is appreciated by men who go out to add to the knowledge of mankind.

Worthy of Confidence.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

HOWEVER cautious a man may be about crediting what he hears, he is strongly inclined to believe what he sees, and his desire to get at the truth is growing stronger every day. This is one reason why he takes a deep interest in what is portrayed on the screen, and it is an equally good reason why screen portrayals, even in romantic stories, should adhere to the truth in those details from which events derive possibility of existence. It is obvious that the picturing of truth shall be within recognition of the audience in order to enforce an idea, and when that idea is the subtle influence to be felt rather than seen in the pictured story, truth of atmosphere and detail rise even higher in importance.

A genuine author rarely invades the publication and sale of his creative work, because men engaged in those departments are better equipped by nature and experience for conducting them successfully than he is, and they take the larger profit because of an investment of actual cash in the risk of materializing and distributing what he has written. The matter of screen publication is, however, in a state of evolution, on its way to finer adjustment, as comparatively few authors or directors have become skilled craftsmen in matters of form and treatment. The more intelligent among them, those who will survive when the merely lucky ones have been outclassed and eliminated, will eventually be able to extract every ounce of dramatic value from a story—things to be studied now are those which will bring about that desirable result. Therein lies one object of suggestive criticism.

Critics do not like to find fault in minor details from a genuine desire to appreciate and encourage all that is good in a picture, but one thing hard to overlook and pardon in a screen presentation is constant and outrageous violation of plausibility during the progress of the action. It is almost time for directors to quit asking the audience to believe the unbelievable. This is a bad habit brought along with a lot of others from the stage, as foolish as shouted asides and overheard conversations and dropped letters of tremendous importance. All of a moving picture audience are not babes and sucklings.

The director-author, usually a gentleman who is fairly bursting with self-appreciation, may throw to the winds the necessity of having plans for a house before it is built and patch together his manufactured narrative—the most costly method known—and trust to his idea that nine persons out of ten at the picture shows are devoid of common sense, to say nothing of artistic taste. The director-author may draw from stories that have been told before, whether or not they are worth retelling, and trust that the intelligent part of an audience will have forgotten all about it, or will be overcome with admiration for his superior handling, yet he is usually the one who sets up a howl and writes childish letters to the papers if critics do not characterize his product as a structure so splendid in conception and execution that it should be styled a noteworthy and artistic success.

The trouble with these vanity-boxes is that they become easily entangled in the complex warp and woof of visualizing an old story, lose their grip on the spirit of what is being told and present us with an empty and crude performance, one bearing the same relation to a product of real merit that a vacant flat does to a beautiful home. The absence of soul is even worse than outrageous faults of structure. The plays rich in imagination and lofty in style will be those formulated by creative talent, treated with infinite care and judgment in the visualization and scanned and edited with discriminating taste before they are released for exhibition. Production of what is worthy of confidence is a complex business, involving the work of many minds and hands.

Among the many writers who have been trying sincerely to define what the stage production should express is one who says, "The first dramatists were children of the theater. The modern dramatists are not. The first dramatist understood what the modern dramatist does not yet understand. He knew that when he and his fellows appeared in front of them, members of the audience would be more eager to see what he would do than to hear what he might say. He knew that the eye is more swiftly and more powerfully appealed to than any other sense; that it is without question the keenest sense of the body of man." One might think he was arguing for pictures of motion, but to continue, "The modern theater is full of craftsmen who are wholly unconscious of their inability. I speak chiefly of the stage director. If he was to technically train himself for his task of interpreting the plays of the dramatist—in time, and by gradual development, he would again recover the ground lost to the theater, and would finally restore the art of the theater to its home. When he interprets the plays of the dramatist by means of his actors, then he is a craftsman, a master craftsman."

In view of the fact that the production of motion-pictures involves coordination of talent and labor in many departments, each craftsman concerned having a distinct line of work to perform, none embodying in himself ability to accomplish the entire work unaided, it would seem as though the director, the one made responsible for the final appeal of a visualization, had enough on his hands. As director-actor he is apt to exploit himself or dwell upon acting that distracts attention from the purpose of the play. As director-author he is apt to arrange and rearrange as he goes along, consuming time and money in evolving a scenario, imposing an enormous unnecessary expense upon the business management. It is the rule, not the exeeption, that thousands of dollars are wasted in this way.

The biggest nuisance in this business is the man who takes great pains to thrust the obvious upon people in front. After poaching upon some work of genius for a plot, he not only mars it by clumsy treatment, but destroys imaginative charm by explaining what should only be delicately suggested to quicken imagination. Such plays are insufferably tedious, besides being no compliment to the average audience. Small wonder that a great critic says, "The one thing not worth looking at is the obvious." There is where most scenario writers fail. Starting with a poor aim and trying to make it effective by an overshadowing moral, they eliminate interest that might be aroused by the story.

Greater plays will be shown when producers worthy of confidence come into closer relations with authors who are worthy of confidence than can be expected under present conditions. Even then, neither actor or author should dominate a performance, but rather constitute one each of three essential factors, the remaining one being the man who arranges and completes the product. I do not believe in the dominance of any one of these factors so much as in a nice adjustment of one to the other. Plays that are to be worthy of confidence in the future will draw heavily on the varied talents of all three. Only their harmonious agreement, each affecting his own department, spells unqualified success.

The Day of the Expert

By W. Stephen Bush

THIS is the day of the expert. The motion picture field can no longer be worked successfully on a placer basis: there is lots of gold left, but it must be extracted by skill and all the modern appliances of engineering. In the language of the miner, the gold along the shores of beach and river is almost gone, there are rich veins streaking the quartz in all directions, but they will yield only to the expert and will defy the attempts of the crude worker who has become rich by placer mining.

Observant students of the situation who have been blessed with the power of thinking, realize that all around us the new experts are springing up, working carefully and scientifically, studying conditions and profiting thereby. Despite all the confusing fluctuations in every branch of the industry one fact is plainly discernible: We must conquer in the sign of quality or slowly and painfully drift out of the business.

Quality is slowly permeating the producing branch. I have the most absolute faith in the superiority of the American product. Through causes which need not be detailed here at this time, we have overproduced ourselves in the single reels and we had underestimated the importance of the multiple reel feature in competent hands. We had produced our single reels in the regular old-fashioned time-table way—so many a week. The blind belief seemed to have grown rankly in all producing circles that quantity was the one thing needful and that quality would somehow adjust itself with the aid of a kind and beneficent Providence. The infatuation, of course, spread to the exchanges. The exchange manager gradually fell under the strange superstition that the question of quality did not concern him at all. If he could work out a system whereby the daily change would not suffer and the exhibitors could be "kept away from each other" he believed that he had solved all the problems that any exchange manager could possibly be called upon to solve. The slogan was: Let Jones' Tuesday release go to Smithville and Smith's Tuesday release go to Jonesville, and lo! the science of distribution has celebrated its greatest possible triumph. Perhaps here and there an exhibitor might in his inarticulate and helpless way voice a desire for quality and would want to adjust his service strictly on a quality basis. If he can be accommodated without losing the 5:21 train to Smithville or the 2:22 connection at Jones Junction, well and good; otherwise he will have to take whatever the time-table of either the producers or the railroads may bring him.

The fact that these methods of producing and distributing motion picture programs have been knocked into a cocked hat is now well recognized. The cause thereof, friends and readers, is very simple. Kinematography is neither a fad nor a toy nor a commercial enterprise pure and simple nor a piece of merchandise nor a system of mechanical production. The making of motion pictures is an art. Closely allied as it is to the dramatic art, it has at the same time kinship with all the other arts. To ask a painter or a sculptor or a composer or a dramatist to produce on a rigid time schedule is to ask that which even the greatest of geniuses cannot accomplish. Many of our producers are suffering for this fatal error into which a supreme confidence in the advantages of commercial organization had led them. They are, however, even at this moment recovering rapidly. They have battled with the multiple reel situation and they are mastering the newer and more difficult art of producing features of the same high quality which not so very long ago characterized most of the American-made pictures put out in single reels.

Whatever the situation may be at this moment, I have not the least doubt that in less than a year the Americans will rival the best producers of features in the whole world. We are quick to learn, and other things being equal, we need not ask odds of any country. We are even now beginning to discard the time-table system of releasing and distributing motion picture programs. We are exploring every corner of the world's literature and contracting freely with living authors for plots and stories which have acknowledged merit in them. Perhaps in time the man whose dramatic talents and whose familiarity with the motion picture enable him to write for the screen directly, first and foremost is somewhere in the offing. So far no real trace of him has been discovered, but there is no doubt that in the nature of things he is one of the necessities of the future.

As the market expands the army of quality hunters increases, and not the least part of this army, either in numbers or in influence, is the brigade of exhibitors. One of the things that strikes an observer of European conditions most forcibly is the independence and the initiative of the European exhibitor. The owners of the great and successful kinema theaters in London and Berlin are self-made men who would resent any attempt to choose their programs for them. How many exhibitors in our country are to-day choosing their own program and absolutely controlling every number on it? The habits of years cannot be eradicated in a short time. Having been used to guardianship, it is hard for them to wean themselves away from a state of tutelage. It is a most encouraging sign that the number of exhibitors who trim their sails with the better and fresher mind of freedom is constantly on the increase. Nothing will benefit the reputation and prosperity of the industry at large more decidedly than a body of experienced and discriminating exhibitors. They are the foundation of a healthy and normal market. Not only must they be experts in choosing, but they must be equal experts in presenting the new pictures of quality.

The method of presentation we all know made a difference even in the old single reel. With the feature the importance of presentation is correspondingly greater. A new school of expert exhibitors is in the making. The leaders of this science of representation are not unknown, and their success is making new disciples ever day. Exhibiting fully as much as producing and distributing the films, is a profession which must be learned. Its phases and requirements change constantly in the direction of progress. The basic fact which stands out most prominently to-day is the increasing appreciation of quality in motion pictures by the refined and cultured portion of the American public. This portion is large and the motion picture itself adds to its ranks constantly.

The appetite for quality grows by what it feeds upon. These men and women who are accustomed to take their pleasures in surroundings superior to the old-fashioned "nickolodeon" are surely entitled to as much consideration as the people who prefer the five-cent exhibition. It will be profitable to cater to them. To win and hold them and establish higher prices of admission is one of the tasks of the expert exhibitor. We learn with considerable satisfaction that one of the organized groups of producers is attempting to educate both exhibitor and public to higher prices for productions of higher quality.

"The Call of the Traumerei."

A Three-Part Temperamental Story by the American Co.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

COMPANY No. 1 of the American's western forces, under the direction of Lorimer Johnstone, is responsible for the three-part subject, "The Call of the Traumerei," which will be released March 9th. The story in the main is idyllic and refreshing in its simple tale of love, and in the artless devotion of the heroine. It is a question, however, whether the spreading of the story over three reels has not attenuated the interest in spots. For my part, I would prefer to have the story told in two reels; but readers are reminded that this is only "a one-man's opinion."

Director Johnstone has taken much pains with the production. He convinces one of this by his artistic selection of beautiful rural scenes for the backgrounds of the pictures, showing the meetings of the artist and the country maiden, who is forgotten so easily. The ballroom scene in Paris and the cabaret scene in Martin's, New York, are praiseworthy because of their spirited action and spectacular merit. The scene showing the interior of the National Academy, where the paintings are on exhibition, has also been carefully designed, and the throng of visitors gives the impression of realism.

The acting of the principals is meritorious. Sydney Ayres centers attention by his forceful and natural portrayal of the young artist, Calvin Demorest. He succeeds in creating the atmosphere surrounding a man of inspiration, and one is not surprised to see Demorest forgetting the heartbroken maid, Enid, who had received his ardent caress with all the sanctity of a pure heart, awakened for the first time by love's overwhelming call.

Miss Vivian Rich is always appealing as Enid, the simple country girl. One sympathizes with Enid, and, at the same time, admires her for the pride that bears her up while her heartstrings are strained to the breaking point. Harry Von Meter gives a fine character study in the part of the old music master, Rizzio. Jack Richardson has not much to do in the role of Luke Smith, but he does that little in his customary heavy character style. Miss Charlotte Burton has a thankless role as the artist's model, but she succeeds in investing the character with a distinct personality. Miss Caroline Cooke is thoroughly at home in the role of the dashing Parisian actress, Vera De Lys.

Calvin Demorest, an ambitious young artist, seeks a much-needed rest in the quiet of the country. He meets Enid Sumner, a talented young violinist, and teaches her to play the "Traumerei." He captures her heart, and thinks himself much in love with her. Business draws him back to the city and abroad to Scene from "The Call of the Traumerei" (American).

Paris, where he soon forgets Enid, under the smiles of a footlight favorite called Vera De Lys.

Demorest returns home after two years' absence, and finds that his hand and brain have lost their cunning. His paintings are rejected, because of their lack of inspiration. He is reduced to poverty, and his old friend, Rizzio, a music teacher, comes to the rescue.

Unknown to Demorest, Enid has become a pupil of Rizzio. One day she plays the "Traumerei" in the room adjoining Demorest's studio. The despairing artist hears the strains, and a great inspiration seizes him. He determines to paint a scene showing his parting from Enid two years before, and enter it for one of the prizes offered by the National Academy. The painting carries off the first prize, and Demorest is saved.

Vera De Lys visits New York at the time and again meets the artist. He invites her to join him at a cabaret in Martin's. Rizzio, who has learned of Enid's love for Demorest, and who is also aware of the artist's infatuation for Vera De Lys, prevails on Enid to attend the carabet and play the "Traumerei." Demorest is on his knees before the actress in a secluded spot when he hears the rich notes of the beloved air. Like a man distracted he jumps to his feet, and, thrusting the actress from him, rushes towards the platform where Enid is playing. Rizzio prevents him from meeting Enid and conducts her home. The next day he sends her back to her home in the country.

Demorest is then visited by the old music master. The artist is in despair, but Rizzio gives him new life by advising him to follow the call of the "Traumerei." Then Demorest leaves the city for the old trysting place by the spring and the rock, where he had first met Enid. There he found her waiting for him.

HORSLEY ARRIVES AT COAST STUDIOS.

David Horsley, supervisor of laboratories and equipment of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, arrived at the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal, at Hollywood, California, on February 1st, for the purpose of reconstructing and perfecting the laboratory department at that plant.

The cutting and joining rooms at the western studios were burned down recently. Consequently, Mr. Horsley will supervise the building of a new cutting room, and in addition to this, he says, it may be deemed advisable to build a new and suitable laboratory building.

Accompanying Mr. Horsley is Mr. John N. Nicholaus, superintendent of the Universal plant at Bayonne and who is an expert on all matters pertaining to film.

"The Great Mine Disaster"

Eclectic Company Produces a Finely Photographed Four-Part Dramatic Subject—Also a Spectacular "Joan of Arc."

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Eclectic Film Company released on March 1st a four-part subject notable among other factors for its fine photography. "The Great Mine Disaster" is strong also from a dramatic standpoint; especially is this true of the last reel and a half. The preceding part of the picture entertains and holds the attention closely. Unconsciously there is being built up the interest that gives the pull to the big situations in the closing scenes. The theme of the story is one of the greatest in life and in fiction as it is also in exemplification one of the rarest in the experience of the man in the street—renunciation and sacrifice: A man so loves a woman that he gives up his life to bring out of the jaws of death the man he has discovered she does love.

Scene from "The Great Mine Disaster" (Eclectic).

There are few principals in the cast. There are a mine owner and his daughter, the manager of the property in love with and engaged to the daughter, and a newcomer on the scene, a young man, who becomes the assistant manager. If Hamilton, the manager, seems a bit old in years to be the fiance of the young woman the disparity is more than atoned for by the acting skill and demonstrated stage experience he brings to the interpretation of his part. Conway, the young assistant, has a most pleasing personality, and in spite of the fact that he is seen to be in love with a woman already pledged to another the author has so skillfully handled his material that we sympathize with the outsider.

There has been a strike at the mine. We are not made acquainted with the circumstances leading up to the strife, we are not told whether it is justifiable or otherwise. We do see Hamilton discharge some of the ringleaders and later we see two of them waylay him on the highway. Conway, who already had made application for a position at the mine, comes to the rescue, and there is a lively mixup which goes to prove that there are one or two white hopes in England—where the picture was made—even if as yet they are dark horses. Conway, of course, gets the place and the entree to the home of Preston, the owner.

At a dance in the home of Preston the manager becomes aware that a cloud has settled on his prospects. He sees the growing affection between the two young persons. Later, when the horse bearing the young woman runs away, there is a thrilling pursuit by the two men over the picturesque fields and meadows; it is the younger man who is first at the side of the girl. She is unconscious and he takes her in his arms. Impulsively he kisses her, and as quickly repents of his action. He does the only thing he can do—he writes a letter to his employer telling him that on the following day he will leave his employment. Preston shows the note to Hamilton; the latter fully understands the situation.

On the next day there is an explosion. Conway is one of those in the mine. Hamilton is the first of a half dozen men to strap on an oxygen tank and go down the shaft. He gets a man out, but his strength is exhausted. It is then he hears Conway is still below. As he is the only available man who knows the workings, he insists on making the descent. He finds Conway and to him transfers the life-giving oxygen. Conway revives and bears Hamilton to the shaft and they are brought up. The ensuing scenes, as Hamilton passes away in the presence of the two young people, will stir deeply.

The atmosphere of the mine is splendidly maintained. The views of the dimly lighted workings are convincing even to those who are accustomed to look for the mark of the studio. The bearing of the men and women grouped about the pit's mouth is worth watching. When the rescuers go into the shaft there are signs of levity. When the still figures are taken from the mine the men and women to all outward appearances are again looking on a tragedy with which they are only too familiar. It is life, and the camera is forgotten.

"Joan of Arc" a Great Production.

The Eclectic Company released on February 20 a two-part subject remarkable for exceptional staging. The number of men involved in the production, the pageantry, the costuming, the great sets, the battles, the use of castles, represent a size and magnificence that might well have justified running the story into many reels.

MISS RUTH ROLAND.

"She makes you laugh in spite of yourself!"

These words, uttered recently by a photoplay patron who had just seen a comedy in which Ruth Roland, the sprightly Kalem star, was featured, reveal the secret of the actress's popularity.

Wholesome, vivacious, and possessing a magnetic personality, Miss Roland captivates the motion picture audience the moment she appears upon the screen. Her ability to portray the humorous roles for which she is cast has made her the idol of the "fans" the world over. She is justly regarded as being one of the foremost comediennes in motion pictures.

Ruth Roland.

Miss Roland's popularity is just as strong abroad as in this country. Her laugh-creating ability has made this Kalem actress a prime favorite with the fun-loving French. Letters received by her from Switzerland bear strong evidence of the hold she has upon the motion picture patrons of that country. The English flock to the theaters on "Ruth Roland" nights, while the demand for comedies in which this lovable actress appears, from the countries of South America, shows that the Latin-Americans have fallen victims to her charms.

Australasians and the people of New Zealand regard Miss Roland as being one of themselves. The reason for this lies in the fact that the Kalem actress at one time toured the antipodes with various theatrical companies. This was before she responded to the call of the silent drama. While in those countries, Miss Roland built up a large following. When it was discovered that their favorite had become a motion picture star, the photoplay patrons of Australia and New Zealand promptly demanded Kalem comedies featuring Miss Roland.

The Kalem comedienne is peculiarly adapted for comedy work. Her's is the bubbling nature that finds fun in everything. It is for this reason that even the most amusing scenarios of the plays intended for her, prove even funnier when the result is thrown upon the screen. Miss Roland is constantly doing the unexpected while the picture is being produced, and this adds greatly to the humor of the play. As the photoplay patron remarked, she makes you laugh in spite of yourself.

Miss Roland is essentially a girl of the outdoors. She is an expert equestrienne, a strong swimmer, a crack shot with the rifle and revolver and has repeatedly been victorious in tennis and golf tournaments. These accomplishments serve her in good stead in her work as a motion picture actress. Withal, she possesses rare girlish charm that has made her immensely popular with all she has ever come in contact.

Marshal Neilan, whose work in Kalem comedies has evoked such favorable comment, was recently made director of his own comedy company. Miss Roland was immediately selected to play the leading roles in the comedies Mr. Neilan is to produce, and is now hard at work in a fun-provoking role which will add greatly to the numbers of her admirers.

"The Boer War."

An Exceptional Five-Part Kalem Feature to Be Released Through General Film Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

AND now the Kalems have carried the war into Africa, true to their laudable ambition to make history repeat itself on the screen. The historic value of this feature is of the highest, for all through the picture is manifest a most painstaking effort to be correct in even the slightest historical detail. No textbook could be more exact.

"The Boer War" is, because of its historical fidelity, a most magnificent and thrilling spectacle. There never was in all the world's history a more romantic and picturesque war than the contest between Boer and Briton for the possession of sovereignty in Southern Africa. The setting was the African veldt broken by the irregular round hills which the Boers called "Kopje" and which looked like and actually proved to be almost impregnable fortresses of Nature. It will be remembered that the British troops in the Boer war, or at least in the early part of the war, invariably made frontal attacks on the enemy. Whatever we may think of the frontal attack from a tactical or strategic point of view, there is no doubt that the frontal attack is the cameraman's ideal of war. It is the most spectacular aspect of war and the one we are most familiar with and like to see most.

The British troops used in these pictures are finely drilled and seem like veterans in actual warfare. When they deploy in skirmish lines and then advance to the attack at double quick, the picture of warfare is realistic to the last button on the uniform. All the different kinds of arms used in the Boer war are in evidence. The opening scene shows "Britain's Defenders" and makes a splendid prelude to the feature striking the dominant key of military spectacle in a most effective and impressive way. We see the regular infantry, the Highlanders, the Lancers and all the commands that took part in the campaign on the British side.

There is a glimpse, in the first reel, of the conditions in the Dutch-African Republics before the ascendancy of the British element. It is well to have it so. While the whole world sympathizes with the sturdy Boers fighting for what they believed to be their God-given rights, it was altogether proper for an understanding of the British side to show that the "outlanders" had some just grievances against the narrow and, at times, arbitrary ways of the Boers. It seems almost unfair to single out any particular battle scene for they are all characterized by the same wonderful realism and the same magnificent backgrounds, but it is quite correct to point out the battle of Elandslaagte as a type of the work which has been done in this feature. Here we see the beginning of the battle, the sounding of the alarm, the marching of the hostile columns, the collision between the fighting forces, and the long, bitter and obstinate struggle which at last left the field in the possession of the British.

Not less true to history than the British side is the Boer side of the memorable contest. There is splendid character and type work on the Boer side, we are brought face to face with the bearded, stubborn warriors, as they became familiar to us by scores upon scores of pictures and reports during the actual progress of the war. The contrast between the two forces is brought out with great strength; on the one side the showy, well-drilled military of a great civilized power, on the other hand the rough-clad, hardy, ill-kempt, but terribly brave and determined farmers, who were fighting for the land of their fathers.

Added to the magnificent spectacular features of this production we have a most interesting and plausible plot of which the war itself seems but a subordinate, if logical, accompaniment. A young officer, deeply in love with the daughter of an old general, deliberately sacrifices his honor and his career to save the brother of his sweetheart. The weak brother, at first ready to accept such heroic self-abnegation, is later tortured by his conscience and when he is wounded in the course of the war he relieves his mind by making a full confession which frees the sweetheart of his sister from the suspicion of guilt and brings a pardon for himself.

The acting in this remarkable Kalem feature is fully up to the high standard of the spectacular work. We have that rarest and most precious of combinations—a thrilling spectacle and first-class acting.

At times there are pictures apparently covering a distance of two or three miles and showing the movements of bodies of men exceeding five hundred. The work of the cameramen and directors shows to great advantage in such scenes. It seems, at such moments, difficult to believe that this is not war but only the image of war. The photography from the opening scene to the last is of the highest quality. With many achievements in this particular line of dramatic motion picture work to its credit, the Kalem Company has in this, its latest production, surpassed itself. As a military spectacle surely this feature has never been equalled in contemporaneous kinematography.

OPENS $15,000 THEATER.

C. N. Gates, of Austin, Minn., has opened the Lyric Theater, a $15,000 moving picture house in that city. The auditorium of the house has a seating capacity of 550, and the policy is moving pictures and vaudeville. Mr. Gates remarks that it is one of the best small theaters in the state of Minneapolis.

According to Mr. Gates, he opened the first moving picture theater about nine years ago in the city of Aberdeen, S. D., which put him third on the list of picture theater proprietors in that state for that year. The year 1912 showed that he had two picture theaters in Aberdeen, which he later sold. He then organized a vaudeville booking agency in Minneapolis and also took over the management of the Crown Theater, that city. His latest enterprise is the Lyric at Austin.

MARK HOROWITZ TAKES MEDITERRANEAN SAIL.

Mark N. Horowitz, formerly of Coulter's Features, Portland, Oregon, and lately touring Western Canada with features, was a recent caller at the New York offices of The World. He sailed February 21st on the steamship Adriatic for a pleasure trip to the Mediterranean. It is his intention to visit Egypt and Jerusalem at his leisure, after which he will spend some time in Europe. He will return to America from London about June 1st, and resume his business on the coast. Mr. Horowitz expects to pick up some good feature productions while abroad.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

MASSACHUSETTS EXHIBITORS' BALL.

First Annual Entertainment at Boston a Huge Success—Many Players Present.

"Up and Down," by Henry.

MASSACHUSETTS exhibitors are now firmly planted on the map—socially and otherwise—due to the unmistakable success registered by their first annual ball and entertainment, held at Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of February 17th (and the morning of the 18th, of course). The Motion Pictures Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts may have been a bit slow to take up the social end of the business, but when its courage and enthusiasm was finally aroused, all lost time was made up. The affair will go down in Massachusetts moving picture history as a gala occasion, and one not to be easily forgotten. "Let joy be unconfined—on with the dance" was the slogan of the hour, and many of the boys ambled—in more or less of a bee-line—to breakfast, upon leaving the hall, so quickly did the hours go by. The crowd might have been a trifle tired, pale and wan, due to its unusual frivolity, but, none the less, it was a case of "everybody's happy!" The early part of the evening was given up mostly to a rapid volley of moving pictures and vaudeville, supplied by courtesy of the Boston film exchanges and theaters. Towards 10 o'clock dancing reigned supreme, and the trade preferred to talk shop, and generally fraternize among themselves, rather than to yield to the sweet, soft seductive music supplied by a thirty-piece orchestra. The various film manufacturers were well represented by their photoplayers, and the four thousand "fans" present were afforded the long-awaited opportunity of seeing their favorites in the flesh. Booths were held by the Universal, Mutual, Famous Players and American Feature Film Companies, all of which were decked out in gala array.

Universal Wins Coveted Cup.

Although greatly handicapped by the absence of King Baggot, who telegraphed his inability to be present, due to the making of an important film, which could not be held over to allow this favorite to make the Boston trip, General Manager James Arthur Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, easily romped away with the huge silver loving cup, given by the league for the best display at the ball. The judges were Mr. Ernest H. Horstman, Mr. Harry F. Campbell, and Miss Mary Fuller, and their selection met with the entire approval of everyone. Mr. Eslow had worked with his usual determination to win the prize, and created a booth that was artistic and in splendid taste. Caps, carnations and silk bands bearing the slogan, "Universal," all helped to give Mr. Eslow undisputed choice for the cup, which is a beautiful affair, standing 28 inches high.

The Grand March.

At 11 o'clock the call for grand march was sounded, and when the line was formed it was discovered that Miss Mary Fuller was leading with Mr. E. H. Horstman, followed by Miss Lillian Walker and Mr. Harry I. Wasserman. Next came Wallie Van and Mrs. Horstman. Our space does not permit us to record the entire makeup of the march, but suffice it to say that it was truly representative of the industry, and very well executed.

Photoplayers Introduced to the Assemblage.

Soon after this, the well-known form of Edward Farrell, of the General's Boston offices, was seen mounting the platform, followed by a gathering of General Film favorites. Mr. Farrell introduced Mary Fuller, Lillian Walker, Wallie Van, Marc MacDermott, and other "General Favorites." Tumultuous applause greeted them all, especially Misses Fuller and Walker. Mr. George I. Appleby, of the Mutual's Boston offices, was selected to do the honors for the Mutual stars, and introduced Flo La-Badie, Mignon Anderson, Henry Benham, and Riley Chamberlain, Thanhouser favorites. All the photoplayers graciously acknowledged the flattering reception tendered them. A perfect riot of applause greeted the appearance of the chic and lovely Flo La Badie, who, indeed, rivaled in popularity Mary Fuller. Miss La Badie has won a host of admirers, due to her dainty appearance and splendid acting. Mr. Herman Sivovlos, league secretary, then introduced several members of the Famous Players Stock Company, including Miss Marie Leonard, all of whom were warmly received. After this, it was a case of tango, supper or conversation, according to individual taste. A very well-catered supper was served, and there were numerous parties, in the several banquet halls. Mr. J. A. Eslow filled the newly acquired loving cup flowing to the brim with champagne, and everybody within reach had a sip of the Universal nectar. The various exchanges were hosts to large parties, where things were "speeded up" in no uncertain fashion. A critical observer could have found absolutely nothing at the affair about which to complain. The various committees worked in entire harmony, and at no time was there noticed the delays and confusion after arising at a ball of this kind. Yes; the first annual ball of the Massachusetts League must be called a "whopper." Bay State exhibitors scored heavily, and it looks like Mechanics' Hall next year, if the crowds are to be adequately cared for.

Echoes of the Ball.

That Famous Players Booth was a dandy; and the Mutual was a slouch either.

The American Feature Film Company, Boston, had an old and individual display to boost the "Squaw Man."

Mr. Harry F. Campbell was terribly busy, looking after Mrs. Campbell as a judge of the booths, and greeting his friends.

Simon Frankel, associated with the various Toomey and Demara enterprises, is one of those "live wires." Oh! you Simon! Mr. and Mrs. Harry Asher (Famous Players, Boston) were prominent in that grand march. They are newlyweds.

Mr. J. C. Graham, general manager of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, with Mrs. Graham, was prominent in the prize Universal booth.

So were Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Saunders, of Universal fame. Sammy Haase, of the Dreamland, Lynn, was "there" twenty ways!

Mr. Frank Howard, the dean of all the New England trade, was (as usual) a center of a big crowd, always.

Manager Charles Stern, of the Universal's Bangor (Me.) offices, was done for the ball. Charlie is a Universal favorite.

Frank Vine, of the General, is a dancer de luxe—into the refreshments room, mostly! Eh, Frank?

Mr. F. H. Patten, the original Mutual booster, gave 'em the "once over."

Mr. James Greeley came down to the ball from Portland, Me., and brought Mrs. Greeley with him. "A regular time," so Mr. Greeley said.

Mr. Arthur A. Allen, of Bangor, was "bobbing up and down" at the ball.

So was Fred Murphy, of the World Special Films Corporation, Boston.

Mrs. James A. Eslow made a most gracious hostess at the Universal booth.

Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Marson entertained lavishly, aided and abetted by Mr. Joseph Mack, his trusty lieutenant.

Messrs. Litchman and Kaufman, of the Famous, were there from New York to meet the New England boys.

Crane Wilbur couldn't "make" the ball. We were sorry, Mr. Crane.

John Bunny was called for, in vain—Vitagraph couldn't spare him just at that time.

"Pop" Lubin telegraphed his regrets at not being able to attend to Mr. Frank Howard.

The proudest man in the hall: Mr. Wasserman when walking beside Lillian Walker in the grand march! And they are talking about it yet!

The various committees were as follows: President Horstman served as floor director; N. Harris Ware was his assistant, and M. J. Lydon was chief marshal. The marshals were: George Appleby, Frank Vine, E. J. Farrell, F. B. Littlefield, Frank Collier, James Solomont, William O. Johnson, John Keon, C. A. Hubbard, Albert Schaller, G. A. Ramsdell, S. Goldstein, E. W. Lynch, W. E. Dowling, J. J. McGuinness, R. W. Brown, W. H. Tebeau, H. H. McKenney, J. Freedman, E. O. Ramsdell, C. H. Buckley, J. W. Raymond, J. W. Smith, J. J. Cahill, Charles Berman, J. F. Kitteredge, Jack Levey, George D. Leonard.

THE OKLAHOMA EXHIBITORS MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Oklahoma Exhibitors' State League, No. 23, convened at the Lee-Huckins Hotel, Oklahoma City, Feb. 11th, 10 a. m. The meeting lasted for two days, and was well attended by exhibitors from every part of the state. The Oklahoma branch now has sixty-three members in good standing, nearly all of whom were present, besides many friends and visitors, including representatives of the Universal, Mutual and General Film Exchange, also the following feature film companies: Warner's, Big Four, All Star, Eclectic, J. W. Morgan Company, R. D. Thrash Company, also Dallas Seating Co., Power's Machine Co., Simplex Machine Co., American Theater & Supply Company, Automatic Ticket Selling Machine Co., Wichita Film & Supply Co.

The Universal Film Exchange had a very creditable display of their publicity matter. Mr. R. C. Cropper, Mgr. of the Universal, engaged a room right opposite the Exhibitors' Convention Hall, which was the most popular place at the meeting. All day long and far into the night, exhibitors crowded the Universal headquarters.

A keen interest was manifested in the election of officers for the ensuing year. Carl Gregg, of Tulsa, was elected president; Albert Jackson, of Pawhuska, vice-president; O. McLane, of Oklahoma City, second vice-president; Ralph Talbott, of Tulsa, treasurer; L. W. Brophy, of Muskogee, secretary; T. H. Boland, of Oklahoma City, national vice-president.

The success of the meeting was largely due to the hard work of the entertainment committee, composed of B. H. Powell, T. H. Boland, and O. McLane, all of Oklahoma City. Much close session work was done, many good talks were made, and a more enthusiastic bunch of workers could not be wished for, all putting forth their best efforts to uphold the principles of the M. P. E. L. of A. The convention closed with a banquet at the Lee-Huckins Hotel, which was attended by one hundred members and their friends. A general good time was enjoyed by all. The next meeting will be held in Oklahoma City, at a time set by the executive board. The following persons attended the convention:

George H. Wiley, National Secretary; H. W. Wirt, Enid; Carl Gregg, Tulsa; L. W. Brophy, Muskogee; O. McLane, Oklahoma City; W. C. McConnell, Pawhuska; J. L. Carr, Kingfisher; L. E. Donahue, Okemah; S. H. Jones, Altus; T. H. Boland, Oklahoma City; Wm. M. Smith, Tulsa; C. C. Harkins, Coalgate; D. L. Walker, El Reno; Albert Jackson, Pawhuska; L. L. Covin, Clinton; Ben Gregg, Tulsa; John Slocum, Elk City; Frank Deal, Wynnewood; Thomas Cadick, Shawnee; J. L. Olive, Chickasha; R. L. Lunsford, Cleveland; Ralph Talbot, Tulsa; A. E. Tinkelpaugh, El Reno; Al L. Ramsey, Sulphur; Roy C. Berry, Norman; H. W. McCall, Cushing; B. H. Powell, Oklahoma City; W. A. Wilson, Dewey; L. W. Mongomery, Shawnee; C. E. Mills, Oklahoma City; Fred G. Wise, Oklahoma City; John Sinopolo, Oklahoma City; Clay Donnovan, Oklahoma City; J. C. Dewalt, Ponca City; H. Castle, Tulsa; Frank Lieber, Muskogee; H. C. Bradford, El Reno; A. C. Thompson, Tulsa; W. J. Sornberger, Sapulpa; M. D. Lowenthal, Newkirk; M. Lowenstein, Oklahoma City; L. J. Hackworth, Enid; M. A. Gentry, Enid; Dad Flynn, Bartlesville; Jas. Arnett, Atoka; C. D. Jackson, Stillwater; A. A. Molder, Sapulpa; H. M. Britten, Weleetka; L. J. Meyers, Dustin; Frank Bridges, Wewoka; L. C. Gish, Oklahoma City; C. H. Barron, Ponca City; W. T. Blair, Poteau; E. P. Mathis, Stigler; E. E. Bland, Alva; J. I. Ransom, Blackwell; R. J. Stafford, Pawnee; Miss Elizabeth Watson, Keifer; G. A. Richards, Dewar; G. H. Atwood, General Film Co.; Leroy Bickel, Mutual Film Co.; R. C. Cropper, Universal Film Co.; F. L. Kiltz; C. D. Mattingly, O. A. Bandy, W. T. Yoder, all of Oklahoma City; Marty Williams, Kansas City; David F. Cowan, New York; Bert Bohannon, New York; Ben Cohen, Kansas City; C. P. Anderson, Muskogee; Frint George, Chicago; J. S. Phillips, Dallas; Clyde Slater, Dallas; R. D. Thrash, Dallas; S. S. Michaels, Oklahoma City; Mr. Hodkins, Chicago; Sol Frankel, Oklahoma City; W. L. Rowley, St. Louis.

PHILADELPHIA BALL A SUCCESS.

Reports from Philadelphia, Pa., are to the effect that the entertainment and ball given by the Philadelphia Exhibitors' League at Horticultural Hall, Friday night, February 20th, was a social success. Many photoplayers from the Lubin Studios in Philadelphia, supported by another large delegation from the several picture studios of New York, were present to assist the exhibitors in their merrymaking. A delegation of exhibitors from New York were also present.

GET TOGETHER AT 'FRISCO.

Local Exhibitors Hold Banquet Upon Return of M. E. Cory from Cincinnati.

The members of San Francisco Local No. 1 of the California State League held a get-together banquet at midnight February 10th, which was attended by ninety-nine exhibitors of San Francisco, and nearby towns, and the managers of the various exchanges doing business in San Francisco.

The affair was arranged as a welcome home for the local president, M. E. Cory, who is a member of the National Executive Committee, and had just returned from the semi-annual meeting of that body in Cincinnati, January 26th.

Mr. Cory gave an enthusiastic account of the National Board meeting, telling in detail of the good work accomplished, pointing out the dangers that threaten the motion picture business, and urging the necessity of harmony and co-operation among the exhibitors and between the exhibitors and exchanges.

Short talks were made by Leon Bories, manager of the General Film Co.; M. L. Markowitz, manager of the Universal; Mr. Stebbins, of the Mutual; Mr. Warner, of Warner's Features; Mr. North, for George Kleine; Mr. Emmick, of Emmick & Traggard. President H. L. Beach, of the Oakland Local; State Secretary W. A. Cory, and several other exhibitors responded in a happy vein. The best of good feeling prevailed throughout.

Five new memberships to the League were secured during the evening. After the speech-making several appropriate reels of pictures were shown, including the events of the first and second annual state conventions of the California League. These films have been purchased by the league and it is the intention to add to them pictures of each succeeding convention.

This affair has no doubt done more to bring the exhibitors and exchange men together than anything else could have done. It was unanimously voted that it should be repeated in two or three months, at which time, no doubt, more of the country exhibitors will be present.

The committee in charge of the affair are: Mr. Goldberg, Chairman, ably assisted by Messrs. Huff, Stilwell and Zzar.

CALIFORNIA EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING.

At a meeting of the executive committee of the California State Exhibitors' League held at Sacramento, on Feb. 10, President Goddard presiding, a satisfactory settlement of the controversy between the California League and the Golden Gate Film Exchange was accomplished. All parties to the controversy are satisfied and harmonious relations have again been established.

Twelve applications for membership, received by the secretary during the month, were passed upon and the applicants elected members of the league.

There was an informal discussion of arrangements for the annual convention to be held in Sacramento this year.

NEW CALIFORNIA LOCAL.

State Secretary W. A. Cory left San Francisco, February 12th, for Eureka, California, to organize Humboldt Local No. 6 of the State League, which will be composed of the exhibitors in Eureka and surrounding towns in Humboldt County.

Applications for local charters from three other California towns are on file and under consideration of the State Executive Board.

ANOTHER EXPOSITION SCHEDULED.

International Exhibitors Association Announces That It Will Hold Forth at Grand Central Palace.

INDICATIONS are that there will be two international expositions of motion picture art in the United States this year. It has already been announced that the Second Annual International Exposition will be held in Dayton, Ohio, under the auspices of the Motion Picture League of America, July 6th to 11th. Now comes the announcement of the International Motion Picture Association, Incorporated, that it will hold a Second International Exposition at Grand Central Palace, New York, during the week of June 8th to 13th.

The International Motion Picture Association was formed, it will be remembered, by the delegates to the New York Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League who bolted from that convention and formed their own association with Charles Phillips, of Milwaukee, Wis., as president.

The committee in charge of the work of organization and promotion consists of Samuel H. Trigger, president of the New York State Association; G. W. Anson, Alfred Weiss, John J. Wittman, Frank L. Samuels, manager, and Frank Tichenor, agent. The offices of the exposition committee will be at the Grand Central Palace, Lexington Avenue and 47th Street.

The committee estimates that there are at least 18,000 exhibitors in the United States and Canada, and hopes that at least fifty per cent. of them may be induced to attend the New York Exposition. To further stimulate interest in the event, it is proposed to offer $1,000 in prizes, to be distributed as follows:

Five hundred ($500) dollars for the best suggestion for the uplift of the business of the exhibitor.

Three hundred ($300) for the best method of getting all exhibitors into one large national organization.

Two hundred ($200) for the best method of financing the above organization.

A number of novel features to create general interest in the exposition are under consideration by the committee in charge, and it is expected that there will be many such features adopted.

NEW YORK EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING.

The meeting of the New York Association's Executive Committee, scheduled to meet on Tuesday, February 24th, was well attended. A new constitution and by-laws was adopted, and a committee appointed to look after legislation in Albany. It was decided to hold the annual convention of the New York State Association on June 5th, at the Imperial Hotel, New York.

H. HIRSCH.

IN THE year 1909 H. Hirsch became acquainted with the moving picture business. That was in Chicago, Ill., and at that time he was connected with the Royal Film Exchange, which was later absorbed by the Globe Film Exchange. Mr. Hirsch remained with these concerns, and when the Globe was amalgamated with the Majestic Exchange, of Chicago, in 1912, he was still prominently identified with the exchange. Mr. Hirsch did some commendable outside work for these concerns in the nature of closing contracts with exhibitors for film service. The Majestic Exchange was conducted under that name until the year 1913, when it was purchased by the Mutual Film Corporation. Mr. Hirsch was then transferred to the New York City office of the Mutual. His work attracted the attention of the World Special Film Corporation, and in the fall of 1913 he received so enticing an offer from the World people to handle the New England business of that concern that he accepted it. After managing the New England business of the World Special Films Corporation from its Boston offices at 1074 Boylston Street, Mr. Hirsch was transferred to the New York City offices of that concern, where he is continuing to disseminate his dynamic energy. During Mr. Hirsch's regime, while in Boston, over the World's interests, he, as he has always done, made many friends for himself, and converts to his company's service, so it is well within the bounds of probability to conjecture that his business relations in the Empire City will be just as congenial.

H. Hirsch.

SIMPLEX MACHINE FOR PARISH WORK.

Great interest is being shown by the clergy of Minneapolis, regarding the educational value of motion pictures. A Simplex projector has just been installed in the Holy Cross Parish, by the Laemmle Film Service. This, it is believed, is the opening wedge for an extensive church business.

WINSTOCK TO HAVE HIS OWN HOUSE.

Melvin G. Winstock has resigned as general manager of the People's Amusement Company, of Portland, Ore., which operated theaters on the Pacific Coast. Mr. Winstock will open a house in Portland, which he intends to be the nucleus of a new circuit. The new theater proprietor hails from New York, where he has many friends, all of whom will wish him every success in his new venture.

Another Talbot Book

English Author Does Not Materially Improve On His Earlier Effort in Amateur's Handbook.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

PRACTICAL CINEMATOGRAPHY AND ITS APPLICATIONS. By Frederick A. Talbot. 262 pages, with illustrations. J. B. Lippincott.

Mr. Talbot, in his present volume, announces that his book has been written "for the express purpose of assisting the amateur—the term being used in its broadest sense as a distinction from the salaried, attached professional worker," but Mr. Talbot takes a few pages for some very elementary instruction and double the number for the higher branches of the work which are never invaded by the amateur until he knows much more about the work than Mr. Talbot seems to.

The trouble with Mr. Talbot's book is that he is not writing as a practical maker of motion pictures, seeking to communicate his knowledge to others, but as a professional maker of books trying to tell others what has been told to him. He interviews a few persons and sits down and writes a book about those persons, interleaves a number of excellent illustrations and proudly presents his product. What he has been told he can tell others, but nothing that escapes his informant of the moment can be told, because he has no first-hand knowledge of his subject. He tells, for instance, how to thread a film on a pin frame for developing purposes. This on pages 67 and 68. On page 72 he adds more instruction including "the film while being wound must not be drawn too tightly, at the same time it must not be too slack." What the proper tension is and why he does not explain, possibly because he has not been told of film shrinkage. He simply repeats parrotwise the information given him, and yet there are books, the handbook of the Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly, for example, that will give him all of this information.

The earlier Talbot book exuded Robert Paul at almost every chapter. In the present volume M. Lucien Bull, of the Marey Institute, is similarly featured, and a major portion of the pages on research work is given M. Bull and the Marey Institute, almost to the exclusion of the work of other investigators. It was easier to go to M. Bull, apparently, than to make a wide and comprehensive study.

In the earlier pages; the pages which might be expected to appeal to the real amateur, the man who wants to make pictures for sale or for his own pleasure, there is little that is of real value. There is the recommendation that a camera of one of two makes be procured and a recommendation for one make of film stock, but Mr. Talbot takes more space to tell why the wheels of a wagon seem to be going backward while the vehicle is going forward than he does to the actual process of development. The average amateur student will care less about the movement of the wagon wheels than he will about the fact that his film is frilling. There is nothing about frilling in the book but there is a lot about the military value of films, how to make X-Ray motion pictures, micro-cinematography and other topics that are about as useful to the amateur as a crowbar would be to a drowning man. The subject of Educational Films is dismissed with fourteen pages and there are twelve on the military value of pictures, and motion study by means of film and The Camera and How to Use It, are treated in the same slight, superficial manner. It is not a text book, it is not a treatise. It is a picture book done to order by a man not thoroughly familiar with his subject. It is a book written to sell to the curious rather than to help the earnest student. It may interest the motion picture "fan." It will neither interest nor inform the earnest student. It is absurd to suppose that a novice will be able to take up the making of radiographs or work with the microscope with the aid of this book, for no subject is treated more than superficially and nothing is gone into with an intimate personal knowledge. It is largely an interview, or perhaps a series of interviews with instructed persons of which only the most patent points of knowledge have been transferred to paper.

The book is not filled with such gross errors and misstatements as marred his former volume "Moving Pictures, How They Are Made and Worked," but the volume has no greater value for statements and misstatements are equally lacking.

MISTAKE IN ADVERTISEMENT.

In the advertisement of the Cosmos Film Co. in our last week's issue it was stated that the big Cosmos feature "Famous Battles of Napoleon," was a three-part picture. That statement was made erroneously and the Cosmos Company requests that word be given out that "Famous Battles of Napoleon" is a five-part feature; not three parts.

Moving Picture Educator

THE MOVING PICTURE IN THE WORLD'S WORK.

What Is Being Done Everywhere.

THE moving pictures and the world are working together, everywhere in all activities of life, so general has the use of the kinematograph developed that it seems as though the time is not far distant when to eliminate the moving picture from its varied uses would be almost as disastrous as to tie up the nation's printing presses; so parallel in their uses are they becoming. It will surely be helpful to the readers of these pages to see and know not only what everyone everywhere else is doing but more especially to be kept fully acquainted with the progress that their favored business is making. The "Times," of Watertown, N. Y., has an account of the opening of a factory at Carthage and Lowville, by the Kinemacolor Co. It is claimed that the climate in that neighborhood is especially good for kinemacolor pictures, as the air is free from impurities and the light is fine. The company also expects to make pictures of the scenery in that section, especially of the St. Lawrence River and the Thousand Islands. The Kinemacolor Co. is now showing pictures of the Panama Canal, taken under special contract with the United States government.

The World-Herald, of Omaha, Neb., has an interesting account of the concert-lectures being delivered by Madam Marie Von Unchuld, an eminent Austrian musician. Moving pictures of the hands of this able player are shown to illustrate the technique of piano playing. She hopes soon to have the pictures accompanied by playing records for she says: "This will make it possible for anyone to obtain a musical education." Madam Unchuld is considered an authority in all European capitals.

From Milwaukee comes, at this time, more good news about the moving picture than from any other center. In a recent lecture on "The Moving Picture and Art," Director Dudley Crafts Watson, of the Milwaukee Art Society, suggested that the society persuade one of the local theaters to produce as near as possible a model program and that the society pledge its support to that theater.

Ideal and Self-Censored Program.

Mr. Watson's ideal program is one which includes a natural-history or geographic film, a piece of standard fiction, and a real snappy comic. He further suggests that three shows be held daily, a matinee for children at 5-30, a second show for children and older ones at 6-30, and a night performance for seniors at from 7-30 to 9-30. A little more leeway may be used in choosing the night program, but sex problems and overburned love stories should be omitted from the junior exhibitions. Another suggestion is that the prices of admission should be 2 and 3 cents for the juniors, with 10 cents for the seniors. As Mr. Watson is a member of the executive committee of the Drama League of America, also of the Pageant Society of America, his commendations of the pictures will have much weight, while his suggestions will also be included in those of others of equal importance, which are occupying the attentions of leaders, in the desire for the best uses of the moving picture for all classes of people.

Commends Milwaukee's Shows.

Mr. Watson's rating of the theaters in Milwaukee is very good; while acknowledging that the whole moving picture show business is in a grave and important situation, he holds that the local exhibitions are of a higher tone with better music and more sanitary conditions than in many other and larger cities. His general conclusions are:

"As a result of the moving picture show we expect greater dramatists, greater actors, greater managers and a greater drama. It will also take much of the offensive and burdensome dross, from the written and spoken drama, and will place it in its real realm of aesthetics."

Moving Pictures and Church Efficiency.

Again we are indebted to Milwaukee for further developments along the line of church efficiency through the moving picture. At a meeting of the Efficiency Institute of the Milwaukee Federation of Churches, Dr. Shriver, superintendent of the immigration board of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, said:

"Social consciousness, a larger unit of attack, and the unconventional method, need to be emphasized as the three elements, making for greater efficiency in the city church task. Illustrating how the unconventional method might be employed by churches to solve the problem of interesting the public." Dr. Shriver related his experiences at a motion picture theater where the film "Joseph In Egypt" was being shown, in the first place he commended the truthfulness of the biblical history, the atmosphere and the setting of the story. The theater was crowded with a cosmopolitan audience. Near him sat a young wife who was telling her husband—evidently a mechanic—the story of Joseph and his Brethren as it was being unfolded on the screen. "Doesn't that carry home one thought to you?" Dr. Shriver asked of his ministerial audience.

"For years you have been trying to interest our people in the story of Joseph in Egypt, bidding them to come to our churches to hear it freely. Here is a theater where people are paying money to see the story truly and entertainingly told. I do not propose to turn our churches into theaters, but I do call attention to the importance and value of this unconventional method of holding and interesting your congregations." These suggestions made by Dr. Shriver are worthy of many repetitions, they are good and will carry weight wherever they are read.

Ministers Ask for an Exchange.

A general campaign for first-class educational moving picture films may result from a suggestion made at a meeting of the Ministers' Union, of St. Paul, Minnesota, that the public library supply schools, Sunday schools, and churches good educational films. Dr. W. D. Johnson, the librarian, is in favor of the idea and the assembled ministers enthusiastically endorsed the proposal. While this plan is by no means a new one, the more it becomes universally endorsed the more likely is it to be put in operation. The growing desire for the easier method of obtaining all kinds of educational films, from an educational center where they are stored with the same permanency as are books, is one not to be overlooked.

Jewish Charities Illustrated.

The managers of the Jewish Federation of Charity, in Brooklyn, New York, have discovered that they can best draw attention to the great work of the federation by means of the moving pictures. They have illustrated some of the institutional work in that way, and accompanied the pictures with lectures with much success. A new photoplay has been written by Mr. B. A. Namm, the president of the federation, and produced by Mr. Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Co., and donated by him to the federation. They show the experiences of a family from the time they land here, until—through the aid of the federation—they become successful Americans and return the help given them by assisting in the activities of the federation.

Advertising Hampton Institute.

Hampton Institute, the famous negro college of the South, is being made widely known by means of moving pictures. A recent exhibition was given in Boston, Mass., depicting the development of the neglected negro. Beginning with the boy in a rude two-wheeled cart drawn by a steer, he journeys until he gets his first glimpse of the historic Hampton Roads and the school. Here he is met by an older student, and his future life portrayed through all its educational and technical details until he receives his diploma and is sent out into the world, in many respects the equal of his more fortunate white brother. The pictures are accompanied by the singing of southern and school melodies, and much good is anticipated by the advantage of these kinematograph exhibitions.

Moving Pictures and the Teachers.

Do teachers want the moving pictures in the schools? This is a question brought prominently forward in England by the Bioscope, a leading journal in kinematography. The question is not alone a national issue but an international one. The English teachers are accused of a lack of interest from selfish motives and a lack of progressiveness which it is to be hoped may not be possible on this side of the Atlantic. Complaint is particularly made that at the next meeting of the National Union of Teachers no provision is made for the presentation of the subject of educational kinematography. Although the conference, which lasts a week, is not to meet until next Easter, the "committee on subjects" declared last November, when appealed to in the matter, that it was "too late" even with six months time before them to introduce the subject. To interested people this is taken as an excuse if not a positive falsehood, designed to evade the issue and from an inexcusable short-sightedness delay as far as possible a study of the question. The Bioscope openly affirms that it appears that the teachers are more concerned about increased salary than a decrease of drudgery in their work; the teachers themselves in turn blame the authorities, this, however, does not excuse them for refusing to give the matter a place in their annual conference. It is predicted that the result of this twofold neglect and double responsibility, will be a demand for a reorganization of their educational system, and of the teaching profession.

In America, while at present there has been concerted action on this question, there is an unmistakeably growing demand for the installation of the kinematograph in all schools, wherever those in authority have in any definite way become acquainted with the value of the moving picture as an aid to education; wherever there is not this demand it is because of a lack of knowledge of the true conditions, and not either from opposition of indifference; on the other hand, as the knowledge of the value of the pictures in the schools grows, the demand for their immediate adoption grows correspondingly.

In the Schools.

There is not a city of any size in the United States today which is not seriously considering the problem of how best to control the growing interest in the moving picture, and turn it in the direction where it may accomplish most good in the education of the young. In the state of Illinois, Senator Hugh S. Magill, superintendent of the State Teachers Association, says: "The time is not far distant when the public schools of Illinois—the larger and more advanced institutions at least—will be on a motion picture circuit under the direction of the school authorities, the purpose of which will be to broaden education through the use of the film."

A similar prediction comes from Alabama where already a partial system is being tried. A state wide newspaper says: "The Birmingham schools are fortunate in the possession of a splendid moving picture equipment, which has been in use four years with great benefit to the schools of the greater city."

The entertainments have proved very popular, not only with the children but with their parents, as evidenced by the large audiences and the larger interest shown. Time and space prevent further instances; suffice it to say that similar reports are coming from every state in the Union. There is no exception, what is said of one may be said of all, the same experience, and the same desires, animate the people everywhere; there will never be any difficulty in the educational problem in America when the time is fully ripe.

Health and Food.

Several states are now using the moving picture in thoroughly organized ways upon a plan to educate the public upon all matters concerning health and hygiene. "The Street Beautiful" is a favored picture, it represents a filthy street, and its transformation to a clean healthy locality through the efforts of those residing thereon. Others show the "Care of Babies" and the "Handling of Milk." Pictures descriptive of the street cleaning department of New York City are at once interesting and instructive; also evils from flies and mosquitoes, filthy water and unclean vessels in common use in the home. "The Gospel of Cleanliness" is another method of bringing before the public, home, factory, and also farmers, methods old and new; showing what should be discarded, cleaned or adopted.

State food commissioners are also busy with exhibits showing how to detect good and bad food, methods of proper and improper handling of the same, sanitary and unsanitary conditions are contrasted so that people may see the perils which underlie customs long cherished as satisfactory.

These pictures are to be shown in connection with suitable lectures at meetings of civic societies, women's clubs, schools, farmer's institutes, and all kindred organizations for the twofold purpose of giving immediate advice besides influencing legislation in these better directions.

Cheaper Living.

Reducing the cost of living is one of the immediate benefits promised as a result of this campaign. "Meat and How to Buy It" is the subject of a film recently introduced by a sympathetic Indiana meat purveyor, who explains to the audience all the various cuts, their nutritive value, guiding the poor in their purchases, and explaining that choice pieces are more expensive on account of a universal demand for them to the exclusion of other inferior cuts which through ignorance are discarded.

"Cooking" is naturally an auxiliary picture in this series, and the house wife is provided with a course on efficiency and economy which will bid fair to aid very largely in present day problems. That these pictures should not be reserved for the lecture platform is obvious, they ought to prove attractive in the ordinary picture house, where, without doubt, they will do most good.

Chambers of Commerce.

Probably one of the best efforts of any chamber of commerce is that reported from Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Under the title of an "Industrial Betterment Meeting" they organized a film exhibition for the benefit of the community. The pictures shown were: "The Crime of Carelessness," "The Man He Might Have Been," "The Workman's Lesson," "An American in the Making."

For a series of meetings of this kind there is a large list of similarly appropriate subjects, so that this splendid example may be profitably followed in many places. In addition to these subjects shown there were lectures on: "Youth and Industry," "Reducing the Human Waste," "Safety in the Works," "Some Causes of Fires." Each of these subjects is now receiving attention at the hands of film makers.

"Civic Pride" is another subject which always occupies the attention of a chamber of commerce; in this particular, the Chamber of Indianapolis is having a series of films made for the purpose of advertising their city as a "Convention City." No one can criticize this evidence of local pride as in addition to drawing visitors from afar, it encourages local effort for continued improvements.

Recruiting by Motion Picture.

Major General Wm. H. Carter, U. S. A., has just returned to Chicago from Texas City, Tex., where he has been in command of the second division of the army, and states that as a result of heavy recruiting the United States Army now lacks less than 1,000 men of being up to the authorized strength of 85,694 enlisted men. The authorized number of officers is 4,744. Gen. Carter declares that this is the first time in his experience that the army is up to authorized strength, and that the navy has also been fully recruited.

An interviewer asked him: "Do you believe moving pictures of army life, such as drills, ceremonials and parades, similar to those exhibited by the British Army, would be an aid to recruiting in this country?" "I certainly do," he replied. "At present, the men come in without special attraction, but moving pictures, in my opinion, are better recruiting attractions than colored lithographs. The government is taking moving pictures of army life all over the country. Chaplain T. J. Dickson, of the Sixth Field Artillery, has taken many and is showing them with much success. There is no special fund in the army for this purpose, and the navy has an advantage over it as it has a special moving picture fund."

Motion Pictures in Army Camps.

Motion pictures are now being used to entertain Uncle Sam's boys of the 27th Infantry located at Texas City, Texas. A new Radium Gold Fibre Screen has been installed for use this summer so that they can show pictures outdoors immediately after supper. Chaplain Geo. Rice is in charge of these troops and is using two makes of motion picture machines. With the aid of the new screen, outdoor matinees are also being given.

A Model Theater.

Fargo, N. D., boasts of a model "Little Theater" at the local Agricultural College. It is intended as a model for the rural and village districts; of miniature size and conditions it will be conducted along such lines as may secure the best possible results, with a view to improving the minds and conditions of the people as also to afford them sufficient amusement.

"The Cloister and the Hearth."

Five-Reel Blinkhorn Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

IN THE garden of visualized stories it is a relief to find the delicate fragrance of old-time romance now and then, especially in these days of sagebush and cactus flower—it is a wide swing from the vigorous crudities of the cowboy, supposed, for some unknown reason, to be characteristic and representative of our national life, to those chivalrous adventures of olden times which might vanish from remembrance, but for screen revival. "The Cloister and the Hearth" is a story of far higher merit than the surpassing graciousness of its telling might indicate, and it is not devoted to the telling of a quaint and pretty story—it presents a powerful dramatic situation.

Scene from "The Cloister and the Hearth" (Blinkhorn).

Peculiar thing about this powerful dramatic situation is the fact that a great French novelist of modern times, whose story, at least, was written later than "The Cloister and the Hearth," used exactly the same critical point in his masterpiece and entirely escaped being charged with plagiarism. In all probability, the plot was not plagiarized—the entire group of circumstances and posture of the character was so different. Two great writers of fiction instinctively grasped what afforded them opportunity for emotional development, with a last chapter that was, in each case, the crowning inspiration of the whole composition. The last scene in the visualized novel has the same dramatic fitness, the more effective that it can be seen, an exquisite piece of artistry.

Gerard, central figure of the story, is an artist by nature, who is expected by his family to enter priesthood and dedicate his life to that calling. He is a young man of lofty ideals, of imaginative temperament, of simple directness and noble purposes, and this role is capably interpreted in the photodrama, the only regret being that the actor's appearance is not more spiritual. A man of sincerity and fine creative talent, he is fascinating to women—they are impressed by mental or by physical superiority from the requirements of their hearts—and, like most men of genius, he falls into a baffling game of love early in life. He defies his parents, escapes from imprisonment, renders himself liable to severe punishment and marries the lovely girl of his choice before he can be retaken. He is arrested at the altar, immediately after the wedding has taken place, and is again imprisoned. After a second escape and a few hours of impassioned love, he leaves the country and finds his way through perilous adventures to Rome.

A conspiracy of envy, guilt, malice and hatred among those left behind results in sending a message to him at Rome announcing the death of his young wife. His agony of mind is strongly depicted—it destroys his artistic impulses, snuffs out the ardent flame of hope, drives him to attempted suicide, and, finally, consigns him to living death in the cloister. He emerges several years later, when he is sent forth to preach, and wanders back to the scenes of his brief happiness. The invisible hand that directs the workings of human affairs brings him into a sudden meeting with the wife he has loved with pure devotion and the fine little boy she has brought into the world.

The way is open to an easy solution of his problem. He can renounce the vows he has made to serve none but God, but his eyes go to the cross he wears; he remembers the supreme sacrifice of Him who perished on the cross, and he bows down in a new agony of soul, such as many a common soldier has felt on leaving all that the world had given him to love when duty called him to face death on the field for the common good. Gerard rises from his torment to a first responsibility of immediate justice, one which avenges the wrong done and provides for the future comfort of his wife and their child. His fierce battle with Nature's sweet and alluring calls is fought all over again—his impassioned love for wife and child nearly consume him—and he finally bows to his noblest ideals, the promptings of what is finest in him, in a concluding scene that will live in the memory of all who follow the pictured story with sympathetic comprehension of its meaning.

A Living Genealogical Tree.

WHEN out at the Essanay plant the other day, I was treated to the presentation of a one hundred foot reel, which serves as a living genealogical tree of the Hoffman family, in Chicago, for the last three generations. Harry McRae Webster, general director of Essanay's eastern companies, was responsible for the surprise, and his interest in the matter will be seen when it is made known that he has married into the Hoffman family, his wife being formerly Miss Florence Hoffman, the youngest daughter of a family of fourteen, twelve of whom are now living.

Grandma Anna Hoffman, who still feels so young that she is averse to telling her age, is first introduced in the pictures. She looks as sweet as can be for her years and evidently enjoys the situation. Her daughters join her before the camera in succession, according to their ages, in the following order: Lillian, May, Tessie, Florence and Anna. Miss Anna Hoffman, the only unmarried daughter, is the secretary of Geo. K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Film Mfg. Co., a position held by her almost since the Company was formed. She is widely known in film circles and is just as widely admired.

Then the grandchildren come trooping in. First little Mary and Peter, the children of Lillian (Mrs. Peter Muller); then Jerome and Jake, Jr., children of Tessie (Mrs. Jake Muller), and next the darling of all the households, Wayne McRae, son of Florence (Mrs. Harry McRae Webster).

"Grandmother is getting along in years and we thought it would be a nice thing to have this family record to look at in coming years," said Harry McRae Webster. "Our children, too, will be glad to see their forbears as they were when some of them may have passed away."

Mrs. Anna Hoffman is a well known Chicagoan, who has accumulated considerable property by thrift and business acumen. She was the mainstay of her large family for years, and now has the pleasure of seeing them all well to do.

The accompanying cut shows a group of the three generations of the Hoffman family as they appear today.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

WHEN these columns predicted last summer that the season about to open would record successes never dreamed of by the most enthusiastic of the motion picture people, little did we dream that such a transformation as that now before the people could take form. Some of the oldest and most experienced of theatrical managers had conceded as far back as last June that "the moving picture game" was the true lane. All combinations to beat it had failed, or failure was in sight. It was only a question of the kind of deal that could be made to save the money invested. To-day we are at the threshold of solution. The people then most enthusiastic are the people who, like many before them, stand at the line of hesitation and allow the speculators to step in.

In past years "nerve" was a favorite term among the theatrical profession. It took nerve for Edwin Booth to build his theater at the corner of Twenty-third Street and Sixth Avenue (now occupied by a dry goods store). It cost him $250,000. At that time that amount could almost buy a good-paying railroad. He lost it, and it was said that an actor who became his own manager was like the doctor who became his own patient. But Booth retrieved and succeeded. He retired with a competence. His "nerve" was of the staple character. He spent his all in his adopted art, lost and won—and died leaving a name and reputation that is revered by all who have studied the stage.

In the days of Booth, Barrett, McCullough, and many others of contemporaneous success, the idea was to give the people the best that the public had been expecting from their conception of theatrical art, and all died leaving a satisfied public. In comedy, there were Sol Smith Russell, John E. Owens, W. J. Florence, and many others. In pantomime, there were George L. Fox, Robert Frazer and "Spade Dance" Adams. All in it for the money, of course, but every one of them dying with the hope that they had done something for their profession, and that, at least, one of those they had left behind would do the same.

What is the situation to-day? The lines laid by the past generations have not been followed. The imitators broke them. The faith in reputations made by those who went beyond formed only a trap to failure and oblivion.

Here is the lesson. The dramatic stage in America to-day is but a panorama to the present generation. The student, like Booth, has faded away. Half the people who buy tickets to see a production of "Hamlet" make the mistake of telling their friends that they are "going to see an Omelet to-night."

It is a sad state of affairs for the true student of dramatic art, but there is danger of a repetition of it if care is not taken to safeguard the modern art—the motion picture—the photoplay. The same microbes that killed the art of the past are in existence now. The poor-pursed, the rich-pursed, the interloper.

In Los Angeles, Cal., an honest scenario writer lost his case against an interloper because the court ruled that the copyright law does not cover scenarios. While expressing itself as convinced of the interloper's guilt, the court was obliged to hold that before the scenario could be protected the text must first be copyrighted in story form. Case one.

Case Two: The District Attorney of New York City is about to bring to trial a party who has been encouraging ambitious writers to produce scenarios, but who has evidently failed to make good. It is claimed that he has made over 6,000 victims. Merciful heavens! Think of the number! And yet columns of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD have been devoted for years to warning the unwary against such impositions.

Case Three: Certain publications, before taking the trouble to investigate as to the character of the advertisers, call attention to strings of moving picture mints producing at least $50 a week profit on an investment of $1,000.

Case Four: A millionaire's name is used as the chief backer for the production of motion pictures. The great growth of the business is cited and a picture painted that induces investment. Subjects are produced, but they cannot be marketed because of some internal dissension as to the method. "The money is there, but we can't get it until we are on a fair and square basis." Reorganization is the next movement and the investors are told that the robbers have been frozen out."

Case Five: "Nothing outside of Wall Street has equaled this moving picture game. Put about twenty thousand dollars into the production of a picture, get the lease of a theater for a period, with the option of a long lease in case of success, and you can't come out at the short end."

And so, ad infinitum, cases may be cited to show how the worm has crawled into the fruit of present-day entertainment. The man of money has noted the great success and falls an easy victim to the promoter, who holds gain in a financial sense far above the consideration of art. What becomes of the Booth, Barrett and McCullough of the motion picture business of to-day? Why is it that the surviving successful comedians of the past hold their heads in shame to-day, and the present-day real comedians join them in mourning? It is simply because the small and cheap merchants of the past who have no thought of the future, other than financial prospects, are crowding into the business.

It has been truthfully said that the downfall of the present generation of legitimate theaters is due to the inferior productions made by managers. But we may safely take a step or two backwards and behind the scenes find a generally overlooked cause for that downfall. Not content with the success attained in their day, or perhaps not content with the profit derived from the efforts of the theatrical favorites of the time, certain capitalistic interests raked the vaudeville field for stars in the legitimate. The harvest was a quick one. But what did it do to the field? The very people who used avaricious methods for the tilling of the soil in the old theatrical business are now at work in the new. They laid aside the old stars the people knew and promoted, from vaudeville fields, those whom they looked upon as money makers. The theater, as an institution, was nothing to the promoters—and the star players! Why, they were only dependents. What has been the result? Scan the high-class theatrical field fore and aft and see the promoters, like rats leaving a sinking ship, scurrying to some other points of profit—the point outlined by the rays from the motion picture projecting machine. And in it all we see a picture of penuriousness.

This is the most dreaded spirit in the business because it helps undermine the confidence in the photoplays that has been established by the many reputable concerns who have reinvested their earnings and given years of labor to put the photoplay where it is. Some prominent managers and many eminent producers feel that their advent into the motion picture field should be accorded the brass band and other honorary distinction. Calm reflection leads to the conclusion that if any bouquets are to be thrown they should be cast in the direction of those who have blazed the way to salvation.

"Why be so severe on interlopers?" asked a friend. Here is the answer: A city court judge of this city has appointed a receiver for the Improved Feature Film Company of America. Quite a name, isn't it? But "what's in a name?" The court fixed the receiver's bond at $75 on account of the company's low state of finances. And the lawyers who applied for the receivership alleged that a judgment for $72.62 recovered against the company last year has not been satisfied.

A receivership for $72.62! Why, that amount would not purchase a decent sized prop for any of the established companies in the business.

Mr. Funkhouser, second superintendent of police in Chicago, announces that he intends to be fully satisfied that the character of "Shylock" in a motion picture production of "The Merchant of Venice" is portrayed in such a way as to not ridicule the Jews. Hand the medal to Mr. Funkhouser. But some friend should give him the tip that "The Merchant of Venice" is not a comedy. Mr. Budweiser once said that "the cutting out of 'Ham' would kill 'Hamlet.'"

* * *

The Hearst newspapers have made arrangements through which they will coöperate with the Selig Polyscope Company to turn out motion pictures of news events. The announcement says cameramen will be stationed at strategic points, and they will be under the direction of trained newspaper men. Mr. Hearst is to be congratulated upon getting in good company at last. He fought the motion picture interests to the best of his ability. We now await results. One good bet is that the cameramen will come nearer hitting the mark than the flaring headlines of the Hearst newspapers, whether the newspaper men be trained, or untrained.

To the Theatre Manager

By F. H. Richardson.

THE exhibitor should read the following lines carefully and consider them well, to the end that certain abuses, from which he suffers daily, may be at least to a considerable extent remedied.

By a system of exchange of films you are able to secure for daily use reels which would cost you as much each week as you pay for their use in an entire year, were you compelled to purchase them outright. In fact the purchase of films by the exhibitor would be a financial impossibility, as you can readily understand. It is only by the system of exchange that the thousands of motion picture theaters are enabled to remain in business. That is a proposition thoroughly understood by all.

What too many managers do not seem to understand, however, is the fact that the exhibitor assumes an obligation, not only to the exchange but to every other exhibitor, when he accepts films from an exchange. The exchange daily intrusts to his care property valued at hundreds of dollars and it is of a kind very easily damaged. Did you ever stop to consider that any injury you may do to a film is an injury not only to its owner, the exchange, but also to every exhibitor who uses the film thereafter?

You do not like to have your own show injured by films with bad patches, ripped sprocket holes, mis-frames and pieces cut out of the film, do you? Of course you don't! Well, neither does the fellow who has to run them after you. You kick about rental prices being too high; also you want better films—films with less rain, fewer bad patches, mis-frames and broken sprocket holes. All this would be quite possible did you and your brother exhibitors take better care of the films while in their possession. True the exchange could give you better service, even without better care of films, but that would mean high prices for the reason that so flagrant are the abuses practiced by exhibitors that a reel of film costing $100.00 or more is usually in very bad shape within fifteen days or less from the time of its release by the manufacturer. For this you must suffer, and so must your brother exhibitors. These abuses are largely without excuse. For the most part they are the direct result either of improper practice or rank carelessness.

With intelligent care, and if run at reasonable speed, and rewound properly, a film need be scarcely injured at all after fifteen days use. At the end of thirty days run it should still be in fine shape, while after two months use it should show less injury than it now receives in fifteen days.

The writer has seen any number of films which had been used on the old Kinedrome circuits for six months which had scarcely a sign of rain. They were actually in much better shape than some films used in ordinary exchange work less than one week. This may sound incredible, but it is true. The reason was simple. The films were very carefully inspected and repaired by the Geo. K. Spoor Company, who employed all the Kinedrome Circuit operators. The managers and operators were held personally responsible for any damage done to a film. Result: there was next to no damage, which proves, absolutely, that damage is primarily due to negligence—carelessness.

In the first place, the theater manager should provide a suitable receptacle for the films while in the operating room. This box, can, or whatever it may be, must have a space provided below the films to receive a shallow pan containing water to keep the air in the cabinet moist. If the pan contains a large, coarse sponge, so much the better. A dry film is very much more susceptible to damage than is one properly saturated with moisture. The moist film is tough, soft and pliable. The dry one is hard and brittle. Its sprocket holes break and split readily. The film tears easily.

In the second place, overspeeding the machine subjects the film, especially its sprocket holes, to terrific strain. In the third place, an operator cannot make a patch properly, unless he be allowed time to do it rightly, and bad patches are responsible for a world of trouble.

These are the three things in which there is sad need for drastic reform on the part of theater managers; many of whom seem to proceed on the theory that they cannot personally suffer for damage done because they will not have those films again. The trouble with this kind of logic is, however, that the fellow who has the films before you figures exactly the same way.

Moisture Cabinet.

It will cost you but a small sum to purchase a film cabinet equipped with moisture compartment. Such a cabinet is now on the market, or you can easily have one made. It is your duty to provide your operating room with one at once, and see to it that the operator keeps water therein all the time. By so doing you will be doing much to assist in keeping the films entrusted to your care in good condition, and at no cost except the slight initial outlay. A cabinet will last for years. Water is cheap.

Bad Patches.

Give your operator time to make patches properly. If all do this it will not be long before there will not be so many patches to make or so many breaks in your films; also misframes will not be so numerous. If you have a film cement which makes a hard, unyielding patch, or which curls the film, throw it away and get a better article. Untold damage is done films by use of poor cement

Damage Through Over-Speeding.

Motion picture films are made to run at an average speed of sixty feet per minute. Some scenes require a higher speed to bring out their best action, but even at sixty feet per minute the strain on the sprocket holes, especially if the gate tension be a little tight, is heavy. Many managers insist on their operators speeding up far above sixty a minute. Some even compel the operator to run a thousand foot reel, which should take an average of about seventeen minutes, in less than ten. Films will not long stand such abuse. At such speed the strain on both machine and film is terrific. Neither film nor machine is designed for any such work and neither will stand up under it for long. Not only this, but such speeds totally destroy the beauty of the scene being projected. It converts the figures on the screen into jumpy, jerky automatons. It converts the whole thing into a farce and if your audience has ordinary intelligence it will be disappointed, if not disgusted at such an exhibition. It would be far better to eliminate one subject from the program and run the rest right.

When you run films greatly over their proper speed you are abusing the property of the exchange and doing all you possibly can to injure the show of every exhibitor who will be obliged to use the films thereafter, just as the fellow who overspeeded the films, before you got them, injured your exhibition.

It is well that exhibitors come to a clear understanding of the fact that in abusing films each one is deliberately injuring the other.

BELLE ADAIR.

IF we are to gauge her future progress by personal charm, Belle Adair, new leading woman of the Eclair Film Company will soon occupy a place in the heart of the photoplay public second to none. With charming and expressive features, Miss Adair is a finely proportioned young lady, and is at ease either in society, underworld or athletic parts. This is her initial bow to the audiences of nickels and dimes, but for years she has headlined bills on the big time vaudeville circuits in "The Fascinating Widow" and has "trouped" with various companies, from the "turkey show" to Broadway successes. The lure of the celluloid has claimed her as its own and she may be ranked as one of the finds of the season. Miss Adair is a New Yorker, educated in Pennsylvania and confesses to twenty-three years. She is a conversationalist, can ride, swim, box and run like a man, and drives her own car.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., TO GET NEW HOUSE.

Ellis Bahma and Frank Brandt will erect at Minnehaha Avenue and Fortieth Street, Minneapolis, Minn., a moving picture theater. The dimensions of the proposed photoplay house are 28 by 115 feet. It will be a first class, fireproof theater. A Power's 6-A machine will project the programs of Universal pictures.

An Ideal Motion Picture Home.

The Selig Polyscope Company's Plant in Los Angeles the Most Picturesque Establishment of Its Kind Ever Built.

By Albert Marple.

Main Entrance.

THE homes of the motion picture companies of California, especially those around Los Angeles, are, to the general public, "Hidden Lands of Secret Doings." By this is meant that there is positively no admittance to any one who has not some direct business with the company. Each picture company has secrets of its own and these it carefully guards. And beside this fact, it has been found that the members of the companies do their best work when there is no one "looking on." The appearance of strangers has a tendency of making the movements of the actors "strained" and unnatural. Then it is possible that the movements of the director and machine operator would be hindered if people were allowed inside. It would seem then that these high walls or fences that have been adopted by the motion picture companies in that sunny southern locality, were erected for the good of all concerned. The general public must be satisfied to wait until the pictures are thrown on the screen of the photoplay theater.

There are some very unique and interesting enclosure walls around the properties of these moving picture companies. They range in height from eight to fourteen feet and are constructed upon many styles of architecture, different kinds of building materials being used. In this short article we wish to give just a glance at the outside view of the Selig Company's plant at Edendale, which lies near the northern limits of Los Angeles. The wall which encloses this company's plant is constructed on the lines of the Old Spanish Missions. There are Spanish features that are seldom seen, even in that section. Of course, at several of the old missions of California, many of these Spanish features may be seen, but these are in a rough condition, while in this and other walls of more modern design they are neat and clean cut.

The main entrance to this establishment is seen in the photograph, above the archway of which is a series of six bells, the largest being at the bottom. These are genuine bells and may be used as chimes if desired. On one side of this entrance we find a bell-tower containing another bell, while on the other is a sort of solid room effect, the windows of which are barred, as was the fashion in old times. This bell-tower, center of bell arch and ornaments on the room effect are about fifteen feet in height and about a foot in thickness. Another entrance to this establishment is on the "Glendale Avenue" side and is known as the side entrance. This consists of two bell-towers, one on either side of the arched entrance, in which is a single hanging bell. These towers, also, are about fifteen feet in height. Immediately behind this entrance may be seen the glass sides of the large studio. In these entrance arches iron gates are hung, these being closed and locked each evening.

The wall that runs along the lower side of this enclosure is about nine feet in height. As one of the accompanying illustrations shows, this is made up of a series of "blind arches." Inside and near the top of each of these arches is an open window, across which iron bars have been placed. The roof of this wall and also of the bell-towers is made of red (Spanish) cement tiling. In color all of this work is of a light tan and is finished with what is known as a stucco effect, which is strictly Spanish. The ground which forms the site for this establishment is on a gradual grade and along the hilly side a "terraced" wall has been constructed. At various sections of this wall "rises" have been made so as to meet the grade of the land and make the fence appear level. Upon the piers at each of these rising points cement flower holders have been placed and in these delicate out-door ferns are now growing, adding a very pretty effect to the general surroundings. A feature that we would especially call attention to is the pretty effect created by the growing of vines and flowers upon and beside the wall. The vines cling readily to the uneven surface of the wall, while the geraniums and other flowers that are seen growing along the base of the wall lend a very pretty appearance.

The Terraced Wall with Cement Urns for Ferns.

A few words as to how these walls are constructed may not be out of place right here. The appearance of the finished wall is quite deceiving. It appears to be made of solid concrete but this is not the case. It is made on what is known as the "exterior lath and plaster" order. The piers, which are really tall boxes, on either side are two feet in width and about twelve feet in height. The uprights, inside, are 2 x 4 inches, while the boards on the side are 1 x 6. The "artistic" work above the entrance is supported by a heavy beam. The pieces forming the ornament on top of the pier are cut from 1 x 6 boards. Everything is rough and unsurfaced.

These moving picture establishments are models of neatness and beauty and are a credit to any city.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE OPENED.

E. M. Heine has opened his Palace Theater, Muscatine, Ia. The initial performance was greeted by 800, which is the capacity of the house. The indirect lighting system is used, and the pictures are projected upon a mirror screen. The structure is one of the largest and best equipped picture houses in the state

A Bad Law.

Absurd Clauses of the New Jersey Censorship Law.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

AS stated last week, the advocates of the New Jersey State Censorship Law are not endeavoring to pass the measure through the legislature. The text of some of the clauses was printed in this paper last week, and, while it would appear that the framers of the law have endeavored to prepare a measure that is just, it is very clearly evident that they do not appreciate the conditions of the business.

Take Clause No. 20 for an example. This in substance requires that each subject "brought into the state for exhibition purposes" shall be submitted to the censors. It further provides that the board shall "from time to time," publish a list of the films passed for exhibition purposes and that no exhibitor shall exhibit or permit to be exhibited, any other film subject.

That is all very well, perhaps, but what does the clause mean? "From time to time," is vastly too indefinite. From time to time might mean daily or it might mean yearly or every tenth year. "From time to time" is as beautifully vague as the Mexican manana, and in the meantime the exhibitor is prevented from using a first run or a special until such action is had and a list published. Then again, what does "brought into the state" mean? Does this exempt the Pathe Freres and the Edison Company from the censorship? These two brands of film are printed in the state of New Jersey. They are not "brought into the state"; they are already there! It is not probable that either of these companies will seek to evade the censorship, but this has nothing whatever to do with the question of law. According to this, the Pathe Freres can film some local happening and show it the same night in any New Jersey theater. The Vitagraph or the Universal or any other company might film the same incident and yet not be permitted to show it in New Jersey for a week or ten days or two weeks or a month or a year; whatever may be the publication date of the next official list. This is not law; it is discrimination and oppression. It is probable that the experienced law-givers will see the point and alter it, but this is beside the question. The clause as it stands, as it is propounded by the framers is amateurish and will work an injury to such citizens of the state as are exhibitors of motion pictures.

Passing on to Clause No. 22, we read that this fee "shall be payable by the person or corporation supplying the film or reel for use in motion picture theaters in this state."

Can the framers of the measure explain what they mean, and explaining what they mean show that they have written their meaning into the bill?

The "person or corporation supplying film" to the New Jersey theaters may be some branch of the General Film, one of the Mutual or Universal Exchanges, or some special feature film company. Suppose that it is a Mutual reel. Suppose that an exchange in New York supplies the houses in Newark, Jersey City, Paterson, Elizabeth and other North Jersey towns and that a Philadelphia exchange supplies Trenton, Atlantic City and other places in the south. These are the "persons or corporations supplying the film or reel" to the exhibitors. Shall each exchange be taxed for each reel supplied, or if not, which exchange shall be taxed? These are the persons mentioned in the clause. It is not possible to tax all of them, since the law specifies that each reel shall be censored and a tax of one dollar imposed; not several taxes of one dollar each, but one tax. Shall the exchanges of the north or the exchanges of the south pay this tax? If the Philadelphia exchange supplies but half a service shall it be taxed for only half those reels? Suppose that the New York exchange has paid the tax and later the Philadelphia exchange also supplies a copy to some Trenton exhibitor. Must the reel be again censored and taxed. If it must be why should it be, since it is already taxed? If it is not taxed, why should the New York exchange be taxed for the censorship to the profit of the Philadelphia renter? If the framers of the bill contemplated that the manufacturer; the actual maker of the film, be taxed, why didn't they say so? If they undertake to lay down the law, they should know the conditions and know that the bill as it is framed places the tax on the exchange, or exchanges, supplying the film and not on the maker.

In the same loose fashion they provide that the governor shall appoint a committee of three censors, one of whom shall be a woman, for a term of one, two and three years, "and thereafter annually for a term of three years." The intention of the paragraph is clear, but it is framed to make no provision beyond the first year for a woman censor and it might be argued that in the strict letter of the law three censors shall be appointed annually for a term of three years. And after that the commission may appoint one or more inspectors or clerks with a total salary list of not more than $3,000. They may appoint one inspector for $3,000, or three thousand for one dollar each.

The advocates of the law mean well, but they are not familiar with the film business. They may know what they want, but they do not know how to express their requirements. These are the requirements they should make.

Each film, before publication, shall be submitted to the censorship by the manufacturer or importer of the same, who shall pay the required fee of one dollar and receive a certificate of approval in sufficient numbers, which may be supplied with each reel intended for exhibition purposes in the state of New Jersey. There should be some central point or points designated for the sessions of the commission and the times and frequency of these sittings should be provided for and not left to the convenience of the censors who, under the present law, are not required to meet at any appointed time or place.

There should be published not less often than once a week, a list of all films passed by the Board.

There should be provided for a sufficient number of well paid inspectors to visit the houses with reasonable frequency and assure themselves that the films being shown are those licensed by the board and with the cuts made as ordered where these changes are required by the board.

And it might be well to employ some person to draught a bill that shall say what it means. This draught is far from doing that and unless drastically altered will give rise to much dispute in and out of the courts.

The sole value of the bill as it stands is to give $2,500 jobs to three persons and smaller jobs to others within the $3,000 limit.

MISS OSTRICHE WILL BE HEARD, TOO.

Muriel Ostriche, of Princess Films, will follow her leading man, Boyd Marshall, as a speaker before the Woman's Club of New Rochelle in the public discussion of "Sunday opening" of picture shows that is taking up most of the club's time right now. Marshall, in his talk of some weeks ago, advised the women to work for Sunday picture programs that were carefully edited in advance and of an educational nature. "The youngest leading woman in pictures"—Miss Ostriche is seventeen—will take issue with Mr. Marshall. It is her idea that an all-educational show bores, that it would keep people out of the picture theaters and in that way have the same effect as the Sabbath closing law that the exhibitors are fighting. In the talk, which is scheduled for the coming Sunday, she will counsel the women to work for either "bright" programs or flat closing, inasmuch as the educational program will not "draw" the people. Miss Ostriche does not advocate the showing sensational photoplays on the Sabbath, nor the total elimination of educational pictures, but she does think that the showing of comedies and farces that people would enjoy constitutes no disrespect to the Sabbath. The "closing" measure comes up to the New Rochelle common council for final decision within ten days.

ISMAN DICKERING FOR PARIS THEATER.

Unsuccessfully Negotiates to Get New Paris Opera House

Felix Isman, the well known American picture theater proprietor and real estate owner, has recently been in Paris. The object of his visit was to negotiate for the acquirement of the Champs Elysees Theater. If he had succeeded, it was Mr. Isman's intention to present a moving picture entertainment at this new, magnificent but unlucky opera house. The building is owned by Messrs. Astruc and the ground rent is said to be enormous. It is located in the Avenue Montaigne. Mr. Isman, after having paid flying visits to various other European capitals, has now returned to the States. It is said that his project was frustrated by a London opera syndicate which is endeavoring to formulate a scheme to present grand opera at the theater.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Doing 'Em Dirt.

ABOUT the best advertising scheme that has been put forward lately is that announced by the Kalem Company. No doubt you have seen a lot about it in their special circular and in the papers, but if it all got by you, it might be explained that the Kalem Company is going to reissue "Colleen Bawn" on March 16th and has imported a quantity of earth taken from the foot of Colleen Bawn rock, as is duly set forth by the proper documents. This is to be loaned exhibitors who rent the subject, and may be put into a shallow box that those who will may once more plant foot on Irish soil.

Some years ago, in San Francisco, there was an Irish Fair in progress and the three nights that we took in the exhibition a concessionaire was coining money by letting people walk over a map of Ireland made of the imported soil. It cost a quarter a head and there was a line at the concession all the evening. Now the Kalem Company enables the exhibitor to offer this privilege without charge to his patrons. In any place this is run on St. Patrick's Day we should want a policeman in front to keep the crowd in line. Mr. Wright modestly opines that we will agree with him that they have done something. They have. It looks like the biggest something yet. An Irishman can be a good citizen and still have a fondness for the "ould dart," and nothing in the way of an advertising stunt could exceed this in value, not alone on St. Patrick's day, but any of the other 364 days. And when it is realized that this is given the exhibitor without charge, we think that the Kalem Company stands to receive a lot of commendatory letters for having done something really big.

Just in passing we are glad to see the Kalem Company reissuing this subject. There are lots of other negatives that might, with profit to all, be put to work again.

Lasky's Scheme.

Jesse L. Lasky, of the feature company bearing his name, is an old vaudeville man and knows the importance of giving the local press agent plenty of material to work with. Now that he has come into the photoplay production business, he brings his knowledge with him and he offers in conjunction with his specials a set of press matter that runs all the way from one to two line readers to be used far in advance of the film to a full criticism to be run the day after it is shown. In between is everything that a manager or press agent needs written in such a fashion that it will be run even by the papers that will not take the usual gush that is sent out by pressmen who are more intent on pleasing the boss with the stuff they write than the stuff they get into the papers. It is newspaper stuff all the way through and is put in such a shape that all the manager has to do is to tear off at the perforations and hand it into the newspaper offices. There are several reading notices, press stories, advance announcements and display advertisements all on stout paper in mechanical typewriting. The sets cost five dollars each, but they are so complete and comprehensive that their use will bring in a lot more than their cost. Rent the films, buy a set of stuff far enough in advance, give it out to the papers and then count up. There is a vast difference between real press work; the sort the papers will take and the gush. This stuff is being turned out by Harry Reichenbach, who has piloted many big attractions and who not only knows the ropes, but the strands of the rope.

Bing!

The Film Man and The Goat Man have been scrapping about the use of paper. The Film Man's get back seems to be that no man can sit at a roll top desk and tell the exhibitor how to advertise his house. Quite so, but a man who alternates between a typewriting machine and all over the place may possibly know something of advertising methods in general, even if the Film Man is willing to admit his own ignorance. We know quite as many people and houses on the lower east side as the upper west side. The Film Man may speak for himself, but there are people who know more than one line, who have experience in more than one line, and though he is shooting at Ed Mock, we will be goat enough to butt in. The Film Man seems to argue that a lot of posters are necessary to get in the crowds in the poorer sections. He doesn't seem to know that some of the most critical and discriminating audiences in New York, for instance, are those who patronize the houses off Delancey Street, the section where his typical "Stanislaus Czarovitch" resides. You can give Stanislaus rank melodrama and he will take it if there is nothing else, but he prefers his plays with a literary quality far in excess of what Broadway seems to want, and "Quo Vadis" is more acceptable than "Trapped by a Traitor." Some people stick too close to roll top desks. The Film Man seems to argue that these people are to be attracted only by an over display of paper. Not a bit of it. We do not mean to say that a couple of framed half sheets is all that is needed in the way of a display in front of a Bowery theater, but assuredly it is not always the house with the most paper that does the biggest business.

With the Exchanges.

We've been out of town for a few weeks, and the pile of house programs has grown. One thing we regret is to notice that the Academian has gone out of existence, or rather it has become a Sunday feature of the Selma Times. In a way this is an advance, but we are going to miss the independent issue because there will be some matters that cannot fit as well in a Sunday paper. Mr. Wilby will speak to a larger clientele in the local paper, and this move suggests that others may find it possible to exchange the cost of publication for the easier way of conducting the local photoplay department, though it works best in a town where there is but one house, or at least but one advertising house. Here is a straight talk on advanced admissions that may aid others:

> Very frequently we obtain pictures longer than the ordinary release and exhibit them at an increased price of admission. But it is not because of their length; they are more elaborately produced, played by more renowned and better actors, and written by authors whose work has attracted great notice to them; in short, they are of a higher class than the usual one or two reel offerings. The entire arrangement is analogous to booking an attraction like, say, "The Pink Lady" and playing it at a scale of prices double that charged for "The Shepherd of the Hills" or three times that charged for a musical stock company which was at this house some few years ago. And there is really no more reason why you should expect Cecelia Loftus in "A Lady of Quality," or John Barrymore in "An American Citizen" or Carlotta Nillson in "Leah Kleschna" at the same admission price you pay for three or four reels of assorted pictures than there is for your expecting Maude Adams at the admission scale charged for Adelaide Thurston. It is impossible for us to exhibit pictures made by the Famous Players Film Company or others similar at regular prices, so it becomes a question only of whether they shall be shown at all or not. And for the most part they are entirely too good to be passed up entirely.
> A lady remarked to us, "Whenever you get an unusually good picture you increase your prices, instead of giving up the advantage of the picture's quality." In that her logic was somewhat left handed. By increasing the admission we are able to obtain pictures of unusual merit which we could never show otherwise. We tell you frankly that one Famous Player production is as expensive to us as are five complete regular programs, and then a bit more. Of course if our regular daily attendance were such that we could deliberately lose much on one day for the general advertising effect on the other five, that might be done. But you know full well that it is not.
> It is an advancement of the picture that these players in such plays can be obtained at all; it is much that they can be shown at prices even so low as they are.
> Consider it; a store will sell you on a phonograph record for as little as sixty cents, yet you do not expect them also to sell you one reproducing the voice of Caruso, Gluck, Farrar and others for that same sixty cents. Just as it is sometimes dogmatically argued that a picture is only a picture after all, so might it be said that a record is just a record; but nobody says it. And yet their jump is from sixty cents to six or more dollars. And there is absolutely no difference between the two cases.

The comparison of the specials with the varying prices for phonograph records is particularly happy.

And here are a few sage words on posters:

> Believe us, the most frequently disappointed patron of the pictures is that person who tries to judge by the posters alone. As his kind increases (if, indeed, it does) the relative importance to the producer of poster and film will change, and one will see beautiful examples of the lithographer's art announcing films of no art whatever. As a Montgomery house declared, "If the films were not better than the posters, why we would charge to see the posters."

Careful.

The Fichtenberg Spotlight, New Orleans, seems to need a little more careful editing. In a recent issue an editorial article tells how Miss Essie Fay tamed one of the Universal lions. The substance of the story is repeated in the Spotlight Rays. This argues too hasty preparation of material.

Just to Be Different.

Just to be different, J. M. Blanchard, of the People's Theater, Sunbury, Pa., ran this advertisement lately as his underline:

> THURSDAY
> The best two-reel picture ever shown in Sunbury, or your money back. For fear you will want your money back, we are only going to charge 5 cents. It's my treat Thursday matinee and night.

"For fear you will want your money back" does not sound wholly convincing, but the rest of the advertisement and the idea itself is capital for one time. The subject was Vitagraph's "Wild Animals at Large," and it is not on record that any money had to be returned.

Any idea like this, giving a new twist to your advertising, is to be commended even where it will not stand a repeat. Perhaps this might stand a repeat, at that, since its first use was a success.

The Right Idea.

The second issue of the Princess News, devoted to the Princess Theater, Meridian, Miss., is a vast improvement on the amateurish looking first issue. It uses a regular newspaper make-up and the work is better done.

The most noticeable paragraph is one announcing that on Sunday evenings the house will be given the Y. M. C. A. Sol. M. Sugerman writes that Sunday performances are not permitted and so he turns the house over to the Y. M. C. A. He does not add "and charges it to advertising," but he might, for it is the best sort of advertising. It gets the people into the house who would not enter a picture theater for the purpose of viewing photoplays, and gets them so used to going there that visits through the week will naturally follow. Pictures are shown at these Sunday Services, the first one being the Edison Y. M. C. A. reel. As time goes on it is probable that the reels will be less markedly appropriate, any good purpose play being used.

Several houses in various parts of the country offer their auditoriums for religious services on Sunday. It is hoped that this example will be followed by many more. It is good for the house manager and it is good for the film business in general.

An item announces that Mr. Sugerman never employs the same printer twice, presumably to give them all a chance at it. This is noticable in the sheet which is not uniform. It would be better to stick to one printer and always have the sheet looking the same. Variety may be the spice of life, but it does not help a publication much.

Growing.

The Susquehanna Theater News, Philadelphia, is growing and now comes out as a four-page sheet 10 by 13 inches, a handy size. It carries a lot of foreign advertising and so has to crowd the local matter a little, but it will probably become an eight pager, when it can give the proper proportion of reading matter. There is no reason why some of these neighborhood house programs should not have all of the advertising value of a locality paper, but Mr. Solomon will have to do a little more writing to get to this point. At any rate, more than double the size in seven issues is a promising sign.

A Guessing Film.

On March 3 the Edison Company will release "With the Eyes of Love," recently shown at the Lip Reading Bee which is annually held in New York City, under the auspices of those interested in the promotion of lip reading among the deaf. The film is entirely without leader or subtitles, the lips being read to gain the necessary explanations. The story is a simple one, that it may be easily followed, but interest can be roused by utilizing the lip reading feature in any one of the various ways that will suggest themselves. Many spectators have become reasonably proficient in lip reading since the agitation some time ago as to the language used in the film and even where there is no lip reading school nor any considerable number of deaf persons, the idea can be used for press work and to rouse special interest.

Small But Effective.

The Square Town Electric Theater, Brooklyn, Mich., has one of the smallest weekly programs going, but the management writes that their appearance every Tuesday is watched for with as great an interest as the issue of the daily paper. It is a slip three inches wide and as long as is required to carry all the type. A heading that looks as though it might have come from some newspaper's theatrical department is used to start with and the rest is straight newspaper composition, the sheet being scarcely more than a galley proof. This is a form of weekly program that is within the price limit of any theater, and yet in a small town it does very well indeed, since it gets the facts over and paves the way for a more pretentious issue later. It will afford a basis for enlargement in the course of time through the co-operation of the local merchants.

In February the theater celebrated its third anniversary with pictures of Warren Kerrigan.

Eight For Five.

H. H. Buckwalter, of Denver, sends us a card that we think is even worse than he thinks it is, and he writes:

> Herewith a contribution to your gallery of poor advertising stunts. I think this is in quality about equal to the eight reels for 5 cents. This is a 5-cent town. Think of it! One house ran TEN REELS, four of which were first-run for 5 cents and another ran eight with four first-run for the same price. And then they wonder why business is bad! Fourteen months ago, by the exercise of a little positive determination in exchange handling the programs were generally confined to three reels and one house frequently tried to break into the better game by charging 10 cents for features. Everybody made a little money because people spent fifteen or twenty cents a night and took in three or four shows. Now they are gorged and surfeited for 5 cents and go home complaining that "the pictures ain't as good as they used to be." A year ago, when the deluge started, the promises were that audiences should have a big piece of pie with a little cheese. But it turned into a huge chunk of cheese and no pie and houses that paid nice profits are now for sale.

Bad All the Way.

The card is typical of cheapness. It is wretchedly set and badly printed, the simplest rules of typography being violated. The house offers Bernhardt in "La Tosca," "Campaigning with Custer," released last August, and four other reels, eight in all, for five cents. Even were the subjects new it would be too much show at less than a quarter admission. Competition is brisk in Denver, but this is not the way to fight competition, and such shoddy advertising as this is worse than the show itself. It is about the poorest specimen we have seen. The name of the house is set in an old English that at first glance looks like an ornament rather than type, though a close study shows that it announces the Eleventh Avenue Theater. The name of the house is the one thing that on any piece of advertising should be clear and distinct. This is completely the reverse. There is but one satisfaction and that is that such managers eventually work themselves out of the business, though they do vital injury meanwhile.

He Thinks.

Here is a letter from T. E. Cooper, of the Union City (Pa.) Opera House.

> Enclosed please find matinee ticket for criticism.
> The ticket was gotten out with the sole idea of attracting the attention of the parents to the program for the day advertised.
> I believe that many parents will sign the ticket who would not give their children money to attend. Also that there are parents who would give their children the money without knowing what it was for.
> I expect to get the interest of all these parents through the signing of the ticket and make them want to see the picture through the children's enthusiasm after seeing the picture.
> But the "get-up" of the card could be improved and I would appreciate the address of the fellow who "knows how" and who, for a consideration, would help us out with our "different" ideas and arrange them in their most attractive manner. Of course the ticket would only be usable in towns like this one, where there is no age limit placed on children attending public amusements. If, in your judgment, the ticket will interest exhibitors in towns of my class, you may pass it along, as I am very much in debt to the "Advertising for Exhibitors" columns.

The ticket itself reads:

CHILDREN'S FREE MATINEE TICKET
For Children Under 15 Years Of Age

Have your mama or papa sign the bottom of this ticket and then you bring it to the Opera House at 4 o'clock

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 21

If your mama or papa signs it, you will be admitted free to see

"WILD ANIMALS AT LARGE"

The Funniest Picture on Earth

Mr. Cooper—You may admit my child, who is not 15 years old, FREE to the matinee at the Opera House, Wednesday, January 21, to see "Wild Animals at Large" the Funniest Picture on Earth ————————————

(SIGN HERE)

Better Come Down To-night and See It Yourself
CHILDREN OVER 15 YEARS OLD, 5 CENTS AT THE MATINEE

A man who can get up a scheme like this uses his brain. He can think and make his thinking make business. The card is a little closely set, but not too crowded, and the display lines are judiciously selected. Anything that sends the children home to talk it over with their parents is bound to make for business, not only directly, but because it appeals to the parents' vanity to be able to sign a pass and so impresses the thought of the house upon him.

Punched.

The Atlas Theater, Milwaukee, has adopted the door knob idea by punching the card and printing directly beneath, "Hang me up for reference." The card is 3½ by 7 inches, giving the full program for the week, and on the back appear the advertisements of several local merchants; a new form of dividing the space that is to be commended. We think that a pair of fists one on either side of the hole would be still better, calling attention to the perforation more markedly. The idea is a good one.

Celebrating.

The Queen Theater, Dallas, Texas, celebrated its first birthday in January. A souvenir carried out the one year idea with a picture of a baby about that age captioned "Miss Queen." The cover is blue and gold, with the baby's picture in brown, a fine screen halftone that is mistaken for a sepia print at first glance. Inside advertisements of the Edison and Selig specials are illustrated with prints of Miss Fuller and Miss Williams, there is a well-worded greeting and note of thanks, the list of licensed companies and a list of coming specials. It is all in excellent taste, and money has been intelligently spent in making it look just right. L. G. Bissinger is to be complimented as well as congratulated.

A New One.

Mo-ve-um is the name of a new house opened by J. G. Haywood, in Aitken, Minn. For the opening night there was a very swagger program, brown on brown, eight pages of which but one side is printed. This calls for double the amount of stock, but it gives a touch of style to the sheet that is worth the cost of the extra paper. They ask for a criticism of the program, but there is nothing to criticise. If the house is run with the same care and good taste that marked the preparation of the program it is bound to be a success, for the program bespeaks elegance in all its details.

In a Bottle.

It's been a long time since we heard from C. T. Smithers, of the Idle Hour, Aberdeen, S. D., but he turns up with the Universal's bottle folder advertising Absinthe and he mailed this out in a letter printed especially for this use, carrying a cut of King Baggot and a few lines of advertising along with the legend "Do not break the bottle enclosed." The printing was done on the face of the envelope, the address being on the back. This works just as well as the special envelopes cut for this purpose and saves the royalty charge. It's an idea worth remembering.

Frankness.

A correspondent sends in an advertisement of George A. Bleich's Empress Theater, Owensboro, Ky. It describes an expensive feature as "An extremely poor ——— Co. production. Aside from the fact that a noted actress plays the leading role, there is nothing else to be said of it that is good. But here's a 'Bunnyfinch' Vitagraph comedy that is good." The correspondent, himself a former operator, thinks it did the house good. We're inclined to think so, too. If you know you have a subject that is not up to the mark but which is exhibited for some particular reason, do not raise expectation to the highest pitch, because then it will seem to be even worse than it really is, and when you have something really big you will not be believed. It takes nerve to pay out a lot of money and have to tell that the picture is what is politely known as a lemon, but when you have lemons, don't try to make the people think they are oranges. Then when you do have oranges they will not think them lemons. We do not think that Mr. Bleich lost many patrons on the day and he certainly did make friends.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Not So.

MARC EDMUND JONES has written the trade papers giving his account of the Hampton Del Ruth matter. He winds up with the statement that scripts may be stolen with impunity. It is probable that some of the other papers will publish this statement in full, so let us get at the meat of the matter. In a recent issue we pointed out that the copyright law specifically provides for the protection of unpublished manuscripts at common law. There remains, then, only the question of the value of the script to show whether it is grand or petit larceny. This merely calls for expert testimony as to the probable value of the script, and the case is complete.

Instances of theft are so rare that they will not greatly worry the practised writer and anything that will curtail the submission of the mass of valueless material will be of benefit to those who are able to sell. What might have been a salutary lesson has proven to be a case of the mountain and the mouse through a lack of understanding of the copyright law.

For the purpose of record it may be well to state that Mr. Del Ruth offered in defense that he supposed the scripts to be the property of his brother, the late Harrison Del Ruth, but the decision was made on the technical point, the judge declaring his belief that the charge was sustained. It is unfortunate that no one had made a proper study of the copyright laws.

What Universal Wants.

The following is the list of present Universal wants according to Monte Katterjohn, their eastern editor:

> The Universal Film Manufacturing Company is in the market for one and three-reel comedies, dramas and melodramas. These can be worked out in almost any environment.
> Just now we are making an extra bid for farce comedies in one and two reels. We are anxious to consider single-reel stories suitable for "Universal Ike." A single-reel Universal comedy always consists of at least thirty scenes. No split reel or short-length stories of any nature wanted.
> We are also in the market for strong dramatic stories of the following nature: Domestic, Society, Railroad, Western and Indian-Military.
> Miss Florence Lawrence is being featured in two and three-reel dramas and comedy-dramas, which are produced in New York until summer weather. These must be confined to interior scenes. Scenarios intended for Miss Lawrence should be sent to our New York address.
> The unusual sort of story always appeals to Universal, but it must be big in theme and forceful in action.
> No Civil War or costume stories of any sort desired.
> The Universal Company is ready to pay the top notch price for the true motion picture scenario. By viewing Universal films on the screen, the competent scenario writer should be able to understand our type of pictures. Universal films are released under the following brands: Gold Seal, 101 Bison, Imp, Joker, Nestor, Powers, Rex, Universal Ike, and Victor.
> Scripts can be sent to either the Western or Eastern studios, the addresses of which are as follows: Eastern, 1600 Broadway; Western, Pacific Coast Studios, Hollywood, Cal.

That Cines Contest.

A correspondent points out that while the Cines script contest offers 34,000 francs in five grand prizes, it claims the right to purchase one hundred scripts from among those submitted for one hundred lire (about $20) each, in addition. That usually is the way with these prize contests. Right now an American company is offering a prize of $200 and reserves the right to take any of the others "at usual rates." Up to date their usual rate seems to be $10 or $15 a reel. If they got only twenty reels of good material in addition to the prize play they would have twenty-one reels for $400, not at all a bad investment.

If you have something to sell, sell it at a decent market price and leave all contests to the speculative.

If You Live In Portland.

If you live in Portland, Ore., a practised writer will join with you in the formation of an Inquest Club. Send a stamped and self-addressed envelope to this department.

Quite So.

One of our correspondents seems to feel aggrieved because "Spec" Woods found only ten acceptable scripts out of several thousand submissions and declares that some of these probably sold at the next port of call.

Very probably some of them did, but only ten of them were of the sort to appeal to Mr. Woods. For that matter, it is entirely possible for a script to be rejected that is exactly suited to the needs of the studio, but too much like some other acceptance.

It seems to us that some writers are too prone to stand up for their self-given "rights." This is bad for the nerves and temper and does not help the sale of scripts in the least. In the store windows we see hundreds of shirts that will match our number eighteen collars, but we do not feel it necessary to go in and purchase every shirt that comes up to specifications any more than we would rent every house that we would like to live in. Be rational.

The Biograph Studio.

By Marc Edmund Jones.

The studio of the Biograph Company is located at Georgia and Girard Streets, almost in the center of Los Angeles, and an easy walk from the business section. This year one hundred and five people were brought out in a special train, comprising three companies. This Los Angeles studio, however, will be of little interest to the free lance writer. Scenario Editor Clapp, who remains in the position he has held for the past year, has been left in the New York studio with the rest of the scenario department, and all scripts are to be sent to New York, differing from the arrangements made in previous years. The three companies in Los Angeles are now only a part of the Biograph organization, and six companies will continue to work in the Bronx studio at 807 East 175th Street, to which address the scripts are sent. Of the Los Angeles companies, David Miles is producer of the company which will confine itself to three-reel presentations of Klaw and Erlanger productions in film form, and Del Henderson will similarly present K. and E. comedy plays in three-reel film versions. The remaining company alone is of interest to the writer, and Charles Murray and Edward Middleton will be co-producers of split-reel farce comedies.

This information was given to the writer through the courtesy of one of the Biograph officials who is in Los Angeles for a few days until the companies can get started to work, and it will be found to be accurate. The studio was not visited because Los Angeles saw fit to welcome the arrivals with a heavy rain, and there had been no time to get things in any kind of shape.

Not Using Books.

James Dayton, Western editor for the Universal, writes in regard to the defacement of scripts, that this does not occur in his department, but that it is done when scripts are taken under consideration by the directors. He has issued an order that when a script is turned back by a director in bad shape the script will be copied and the cost of the same charged to the offending director; a course that should very quickly put a stop to the trouble.

And as an additional piece of good news Mr. Dayton promises that soon we shall be able to print one of his multiple reels.

Technical Terms.

Courtney Ryley Cooper, speaking of the abuse of technical terms, writes that he has disposed of some fifteen scripts, mostly two-reelers, since last July, without having had recourse to the jargon of the studio and adds:

> About two months ago a sweet young thing came to me with a script. Every other word was "flash" or "register" or something else, the meaning of which I knew little. I had always worried along by just saying what I meant and letting it go at that. I called the girl down to my office.
> "What's all this junk?" I asked, referring to the technical terms.
>
> "Do you mean to pretend that you do not know the meaning of the terms?" came in counter.
> "Just what I mean, and speaking frankly, if you know enough about picture writing to use all that, I don't see where my help would come in."
> For all of which I later heard that I wasn't much of a writer, anyway, that I was bald and not so very good looking and that I was so jealous of anyone else who tried to write that I would not do a thing for them.

And there's the answer. Mr. Cooper had ideas and sold them. The other had a mass of technical terms she did not know what to do with, but no ideas. She had studied vocabulary instead of stories.

The Reason.

A correspondent wants to know what right an editor has to turn down a photoplay simply because it is not typed.

There it goes again! What right! The right of the buyer to decide for himself what he will and will not do. That is all the right he needs.

Would you take some flour and water and yeast and mix them up and ask any sane person to buy it for bread simply because you had no oven to bake it in? Would you have any right to demand the purchase of the dough where bread was wanted?

The editor wants typed scripts because he cannot spend the time wasted in deciphering even the plainest handwriting. For this reason he requires that scripts be typed, so type them.

Then, too, the writer objects that some editors turn down scripts that the public might like. Possibly he does. If he takes all the bad scripts and rejects the good ones, he will lose his job. It is the author's misfortune if he rejects a winner, but what is there to prove that the rejected script would be a winner?

Another correspondent suggests that we should help the beginner instead of scolding him. If we can knock some of these fool notions out of the beginners' heads we are giving more help than if we sobbed over their imagined wrongs.

The author has no "rights" other than those of courtesy. Let the beginner exercise courtesy and he will receive courtesy in return ninety-nine times in the hundred, but let him bawl about his "rights," and the fool killer starts for his gun.

Adaptations.

This seems to be the week to explain to several recent inquirers that if John Johnson prints a book and copyrights it, it is his advertisement to the world that he expects to be protected from thieves and that to take John Johnson's story and try and sell it is just as much stealing as taking the eggs from under John Johnson's hens. Just as a variant, Arthur Leeds sends a letter in which an "expert" adviser tells a lady that she can dramatize the Sherlock Holmes stories. Sure she can, but if she tries to sell them she'll get into trouble.

The studio can take care of the purchase of such copyrighted material as it desires and it can also have these adapted into plays by its own people. All it wants from the outside writers is your original thoughts, and your original thought is not to be found inside the covers of some one else's book.

Tap! Tap! Tap!

Scene 7.—Boat pier by hulk. Moonlight.
Adam comes down the river in fishing boat, fastens it to pier, and hails, Hilda comes to greet him, he hands her a fine big fish, she thanks him, he puts the fish on the wharf and they sit down on the end. He rubs his hands looking at her with evident love.
Note.—A couple of shabby row boats—evidently belonging to Daddy—and Hilda—are always to be seen—for future business—fastened to this wharf.

Scene 8.—Side of dock (moonlight). Steamer in evidence in background. The boat from "The Wanda" is waiting.
Forbes and sailor are rowing off. Other small boats fastened to wharf to show usual river travel, etc.

Scene 9.—Pier (moonlight).
Adam saying good-bye—leaving. Hilda stands waving good-bye. Forbes boat appears as she stands waving in the moonlight—attracted by Hilda—she watching him (panoram to houseboat away from Hilda to show Forbes landing at houseboat). When he gets out of boat to board "The Wanda," he turns and looks back at Hilda before he climbs aboard to be greeted by his mother and laughing guests. Panoram back to pier where Hilda is looking back wistfully at the bright lights, turns and slowly walks off to hulk.

Scene 10.—IN THE MORNING.
Exterior of hulk.
Hilda discovered reading, and shelling peas at the same time, studying very hard. Daddy comes out door and as he sees book again—says something indicative of tolerant attitude toward something he can't understand—goes walking out showing how very lame he is, leaning heavily on his cane.

Scene 11.—Deck of "THE WANDA."
Party on board lounging, fishing off side, etc. Evelyn evidently trying to attract Forbes, who looks politely bored—Mrs. Forbes looks impatiently at him—shows she is not pleased—Forbes says he is going ashore after looking over towards slip and evincing remembrance of Hilda. Sailor enters in row-boat, he tells him to wait and take him ashore. Mother and Evelyn laughingly protest, but he smilingly says he is going, starts to get in boat.

Scene 12.—"IT'S HARD TO STUDY ALONE—BUT I WILL HAVE AN EDUCATION. . . . AND IT'S THE ONLY WAY."
Exterior of hulk—as before.
Hilda sighs and then with determination says leader—becomes impatient at Something she can't understand and throws the book from her.
Cut to;

Scene 13.—Side of hulk.
Forbes as he passes the corner is struck by the book. Cut to;

Scene 14.—Exterior of hulk.
Hilda jumps to her feet in dismay as she sees she has hit the stranger, both laugh and become acquainted—he questions her after glancing at the book and seeing the nature of it—pointing to book—business shows he is interested. Hilda's father limps into the scene—stops at sight of Forbes. Hilda smilingly explains about hitting the stranger, etc. Takes out pipe and offering tobacco to Daddy, both begin to smoke and talk—Forbes anxious to please Daddy.

Scene 15.—"THE FISHERMAN WOOER FROM DOWN THE RIVER CALLS AGAIN."
Interior of kitchen and living-room of hulk. (Night).
Daddy is dozing by a table, nodding over a newspaper. Adam awkwardly turning hat in hands—has evidently quite dressed up—(avoid comedy in clothes). Looking adoringly at Hilda as she prepares some toddy from an old demijohn, and a bucket of water,—sugar, etc.

Scene 16.—Side of "The Wanda." (Night).
Forbes in evening clothes quickly setting off towards shore—(Tuxedo coat).

Scene 17.—Interior hulk kitchen.
Adam leans over and starts to tell Hilda he loves her, when Daddy awakens. Adam draws back nonplussed. Hilda serves toddy, and men contently sip it. Adam smacks his lips and tells Hilda its fine—she is pleased.

Scene 18.—Exterior hulk.
Forbes strolls in smoking a cigar—glances in window, manifests annoyance at what he sees.

Scene 19.—Interior hulk kitchen. As before.
Hilda glances toward window—is startled—hand to heart (Adam notes this—she stares at Forbes face showing in the light—through the window. Goes to and asks him to enter. He does so and all rather stare at the clothes— (they've never seen any like them) general awkwardness of situation felt. Forbes amused—accepts offer of toddy and proffers his silver cigar case—not to be outdone in politeness Daddy accepts, but Adam declines—keenly glances from Hilda to Forbes and sighs—then says "Good night,"—and off. As he goes Hilda eagerly gets out her books and pulls up to the table, Forbes pulls up his chair also—Daddy shows he is quite accustomed to the lessons—pays no more attention.

Scene 20.—GOLDEN HOURS.
Small boat in river.
Forbes (in white flannels—coat in bow) is rowing. Hilda lazily watching him. Very happy. Forbes ships oars, leans over and catches one of her braids—asks to see it flowing—playfully unbraids one braid while she unbraids the other. In a storm of passion he catches the flowing strands in both hands and convulsively presses them to his lips, twisting them about his fingers. Cut in;
"YOU'RE ABLE TO STRANGLE MY SOUL IN THE MESH OF YOUR EBONY HAIR."
Back to scene:
Hilda half frightened shrinks slightly from him, he grasps her passionately in his arms—she struggles and tries to free herself, pointing to shore demands he take her back—he refuses—she insists—business shows he tells her not till she forgives his roughness—then—she jumps deliberately overboard—as she strikes out her hair floats back of her on the water—so, having her own way, she forgives him and turning smiles triumphantly back at him—he staring at her—(because of later business he must act as though fascinated or almost hypnotized by the sight of the long black hair in the water). As she leaves scene, he puts hand to eyes a moment,—and spell is broken—he gets oars and rows after her, calling.

Scene 21.—Pier.
Hilda climbing up on pier, her hair dripping about her—stands laughing—waves hand to Forbes as he rows towards her—and nodding good-bye—goes toward hulk. He rows to the houseboat, panoram to "The Wanda"—Evelyn and Mrs. Forbes watching with varied emotions—as Forbes rows up to the side of the boat.

Scene 22.—"I HEAR THE TAP—TAP—TAP OF YOUR FATHER'S CANE."
Exterior hulk.
Forbes and Hilda discovered—school-books. She lying back in his arms with a sort of abandon—he twisting her braids about in his hands playfully puts braids about his throat—half choking himself. Listens a moment, gives leader, hastily goes a few feet from her—she astonished—Why act so? attitude.

Scene 23.—Pier.
Adam walking from end toward hulk—notes Forbes' boat fastened to pier. Cut to;

Scene 24.—Exterior hulk.
Forbes and Hilda as before, Daddy enters—greeting, etc. Forbes nervously picks up books—indicates to father that he has been teaching her the lesson. She puzzled at his pretense—Adam enters—Forbes takes leave.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

Mrs. R. B. F.—Few scripts are read beyond the synopsis if this does not appeal. If you cannot make plain the value of a one-reel story in two hundred words, you are not yet sufficiently practised to write a story worth accepting. No "injustice" is done you because the entire script is not read through. People who talk in that strain seldom, if ever, make really good writers.

P. K.—Try any company working in Los Angeles.

H. G. P.—A. Presco played Jim, in "Thorns of the Gay White Way." Ruby is the name of the company making the subject, and Warner the title of the selling company.

C. M.—We do not endorse any correspondence school, because we do not believe that photoplay writing can be taught by mail, and some of the professors not only do not help you, but by giving you poor advice, they hurt whatever chance you may have. The first two you mention are vicious.

J. B.—The Biograph Identifier places William Russell in the role you mention.

M. E. H.—The Reliance cast is not given. Thomas Chatterton was Patrick, in "True Irish Hearts." The K B Identifier thinks the Keystone player is Miss Barret.

C. F. D.—Richard Stanton was Danny, and Miss Anna Little, Rose, in "True Irish Hearts." See above for Patrick. In "The Woman Haters," Roscoe Arbuckle and Nick Cogley were the two old tars. Jack Hamilton is the K-B "Shorty."

ED-GEORGE.—In "The Web," Miss Rosemary Theby was Beatrice, and Miss Anita Stewart was Agatha. Miss Clara Kimball Young was Zoe in "The White Slave." In "The Little Minister," Miss Young was Lady Babbie, whom the minister married. Mrs. Kimball was his mother.

A. F. W.—What really makes you an author is practise work. Fifteen plays in four years is not sufficient practise. Build up your string to say fifty scripts. It is practise that makes perfect, and no matter how exhaustive your study may have been without practice, without the practical application of your ideas, you are still in the novice class. Get busy.

A. B. C.—Licensed films are made under license from the Motion Picture Patents Company, holding the Edison-Biograph patents. Independent films are made by those manufacturers who contend that they are not required to take out licenses, and therefore are independent of the company. This is the hundred and eleventh, and last time this question is going to be replied to.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

Important Notice.

It is impossible to reply to letters through the department in less than two weeks and sometimes three. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents in stamps to cover cost will receive carbon copy of the department reply by mail immediately.

The first seventy-four questions are now in print in neat pamphlet form and may be obtained by remitting 25 cents to the editor.

Question No. 22.

Explain the action (electrical) of the d. c. motor, as compared to the d. c. generator. Explain the relative effect of cutting in and cutting out resistance in series with the shunt field of a motor and a generator. What would be the effect of placing resistance in series with the compounding of a compound wound generator?

Describe and illustrate, by sketch, the method usually employed in attaching commutator bars, and explain how you would proceed if your commutator showed signs of loosening.

Roll of Honor.

Question No. 16 seems to have been somewhat of a poser, as there were very few correct replies, though the few which were correct were very good indeed. Again, however, Ernest D. Wills, of Brookings, South Dakota, has pulled down the plum. You fellows must get busy, because brother Wills is working good and hard and his answers are both comprehensive and excellent, but I don't want to see him swipe all the glory, therefore, as I said, it's up to the rest of you to dig just a little bit harder. Brother W. S. James, Camden, N. J., sent in a very good reply indeed, as did also Fort Worth, Texas, and John Griffiths, Ansonia, Conn. In fact there was not very much choice between these four, but friend Wills' ingenious method of connecting cast the deciding vote in his favor. Chicago, Ill., Cleveland, Ohio, and Seattle, Wash., sent in fairly good replies. L. B. Minges, Lestershire, N. Y., did very well. As did also Harry T. Dobson and W. L. Johnston, both of Toronto, Canada. The rest were not. I am sorry to say, deserving of the Roll of Honor.

Reply to Question No. 16.

By Ernest D. Wills, Brookings, South Dakota.

The question:

Suppose your manager contemplated the purchase of a generator to be run by engine power, supplying current for his theater. How would you determine the necessary capacity of the generator; what voltage would you recommend it to be? Give your reasons, in detail, for recommending that particular voltage. Having determined the wattage capacity of your generator, what relative h.p. should the engine be?

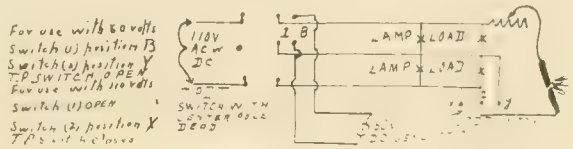
The Answer:

Assume picture arc takes 40 amperes at 48 volts, which equals 1,920 watts. If 110 volts are used, loss in rheostat will be 2,480 watts; if 60 volts are used loss in rheostat will be 480 watts. I would advise a 60-volt set and will work out the capactiy on that assumption. Loss in rheostat 480 watts. Total output necessary 60 x 40 = 2,400 watts. In the above, line loss is neglected as the generating set will be close enough and the rheostat would compensate for any line drop. Any generator will last longer, run more efficiently and keep cooler if not loaded to its full capacity. Number of lights necessary in an average show we will say are as follows: One flaming arc 60 volt, 10 ampere, 600 watts: forty 25-watt tungsten lamps or equivalent load, 1,000 watts. Total load, therefore, is 2,400 + 600 + 1,000 = 4,000 watts, or 4 k.w. So to be on the safe side I would select a machine with a normal rating of 5½ k.w., or, if the lamp load or motor load was not so heavy, say only half as much, we might use a somewhat smaller one. In this case, however, I would advise the 5½ k.w., which would allow a good margin. The output for the projection arc will be constant for any installation, and if you do not use up to the figured amount of current for the arc it will allow your machine to run easier and if it becomes necessary to increase your load you have the required capacity. I would, as I said before, recommend in this case a 60-volt set for the following reasons:

(a) There is less loss in the controlling resistance and this amounts to a great deal on a small generator. From the standpoint of economy, if nothing else, 60 volts should be used. By the use of a three-pole double throw switch, as per diagram, the load can be thrown to the power company's 110-volt circuit, assuming that a rheostat is on hand that will handle that voltage.

(b) There is no excessive amount of heat generated in or around the operating room as the rheostat loss is less.

(c) The lamps (tungsten) rated at 60 volts have a stronger filament than those of higher voltage. Even if nothing else but the economy and the lack of the "stove" were considered there should be no question as to which voltage should be used. One reason why 60-volt plants have fallen into ill-repute is that some people will buy a little 2 k.w., 60-volt plant and overload it until it eats itself to pieces and then blame it on the voltage, or will connect a 110-volt rheostat in series with it and the lamp and wonder why they cannot get light.



In the diagram all things such as fuses, switches, etc., are left out for the sake of clearness. The one thing to watch for in this plan is to try to keep the load balanced, for if you don't the lamps on the two sides will burn with unequal brightness, but in any case if a man has his own plant he will use the company's current only to tide him over. As to the horsepower required, it will depend upon the drive, for a belted outfit not only takes from two to eight times the room required for a direct connected set, but also the loss may be as high as 15%, while in a direct connected set the bearings will not only last longer, but the light is likely to be steadier. In short, however, knowing the capacity of the generator, and allowing a safe margin for losses, multiply the output of the generator in k.w. by 1.8181 and take the nearest even number. This will give your h.p. close enough for all practical purposes. For instance: We have a 3.3 k.w., set: h.p. = 3.3 x 1.8181 = 5.9994, so take 6 h.p. for the engine. This rule applies to gas engines in particular, as a steam engine can produce more than its rated h.p. by changing pressures and points of cut-off, and doesn't suffer any special injury through overload, except possibly greater wear, while a gas engine when overloaded does not lay down and quit, but struggles along and tears itself to pieces, therefore, it pays to get an engine plenty large enough for the load. In this case with a 5½ k.w. generator I would advise a 10 h.p. gasoline or kerosene engine, giving approximately 2.5 h.p. surplus.

I would call particular attention to the reply to Question 16, since this is a very important matter to operators and managers who may be figuring on installing light plants. The allowance over and above actual needs is of the utmost importance, and I think Brother Wills has it figured out about right. I personally believe a 70-volt set is better than a 60, since 60 is a little low to give the best arc regulation. There is always economy in having a generator and engine larger than is absolutely necessary. Of course, both generators and engines are supposed to be capable of carrying an overload, but it is neither economy nor good practice to overload either. Friend James, of Camden, brought this matter out in his reply also, and he was entirely correct. Friend Wills' method of connecting to a supply of higher voltage is unique, though it will hardly be adopted, I think, owing to extra wiring necessary and the doubling of all lamps. It would work all right, however, and work perfectly, too, I think. The practical method is to connect the house lamps in series with enough rheostatic resistance to reduce the voltage to 60.

You're Welcome.

M. P. Operators' Union No. 75, I. A. T. S. E., Peoria, Illinois, writes:

> Local No. 75 wishes to thank you for the space devoted to it, December 6th issue. All our members who have purchased your Handbook are well pleased, and would not be without them. We give our Ball January 28th and wish you could be with us.

It would have been a very genuine pleasure to have been able to have danced the Tango at your ball. Am much pleased to know your boys liked the book. As to the space, you are as welcome as the flowers in May.

He Objects.

M Slotkin, manager of the Plaza Theater, Erie, Pa., objects to our editorial concerning cheap supplies, as follows:

> I read with interest your article, entitled "Cheap Supplies." I differ with you on this subject. First, the machine manufacturers charge excessive prices for their parts. Second, any good machinist with necessary tools can produce just as good parts as are made by the manufacturers. There are only a few parts which are difficult to make, and for these the manufacturer can charge a fair price. But you cannot convince me that a flat spring, for which a manufacturer charges 15 cents, cannot be made by anyone for one cent and sold for five. I am a machinist by trade, at one time manufacturer of light machinery, and know what I am talking about. Instead of advising exhibitors to buy parts from the machine manufacturers at a high price, you should advise the manufacturers to reduce considerably their prices on these parts, and thus kill competition.

I have given this letter space, because friend Slotkin represents the "other side," which is entitled to be heard. I don't agree with him, for several reasons. First, he entirely side-steps the main proposition, viz.: That the machine manufacturer has a vast interest at stake in his machine, which may at any time be injured by the substitution of inferior parts. Second, I don't agree with him that the manufacturers charge excessive prices. It may be conceded that the parts spoken of could possibly be manufactured, after the necessary dies, etc., have been made (very costly tools), and the necessary press has been purchased with which to manipulate these dies (another cheaply costly tool), but it is a fact well known to those who have had experience that it costs, as a rule, considerably more to "handle" a small part of this kind than it does to make it. By this I mean that, while a small part, the spring spoken of, for instance, does not contain much material, still it has to be handled several times before it finally reaches the consumer, and all this adds to the cost. It involves just as much labor for the manufacturer to fill an order for a small spring, the list price of which is 15 cents, as it does to fill an order for an intermittent sprocket costing, if I remember right, about $3.50. Then, too, what is known as the overhead expense of the machine manufacturer is enormous, as compared to the small manufacturer, and this is something which cannot be avoided.

It is quite true, as Brother Slotkin says, that it is not difficult to make, for instance, a gear; that is to say, it does not appear to be difficult, but after acting as inspector for the Nicholas Power Company for four years, and having during that time inspected more than 12,000 new mechanisms, I can tell neighbor Slotkin that the above company had about as much difficulty in producing perfect gears as they did in producing any other one thing in connection with their mechanism. It took fully four years of careful experimenting and study to produce gears that would give satisfaction, both as to material and workmanship. I can also tell friend Slotkin, of my own positive knowledge, that there was enormous difficulty encountered in producing satisfactory spindles, or shafts, and it was only done when very costly high speed grinders were installed for that purpose. Taking these things into consideration, I think I may say that friend Slotkin is absolutely and entirely in the wrong. I may not be able to convince him of that fact, but possibly my experience and grasp of these matters, as applied to projection machines, is somewhat broader than his own, even though he be a machinist. It is possible that the manufacturer might reduce the prices on some parts to some extent, but, on the whole, I don't think, everything considered, machine manufacturers are charging excessive prices. If Mr. Slotkin could take a trip with me through one of the New York moving picture machine manufacturers' factories I am sure his eyes would open with amazement at the magnitude of the business, and the great number of exceedingly costly machines necessary to the work of making a modern projector, working to a thousandth of an inch no longer suffices. On some parts only a variation of three or four ten-thousandths is allowed.

Omaha Criticised.

Jack Kittess has recently visited Omaha and sends in the following:

> I did not stay in Omaha long enough to see all the theaters. I understand some of the suburban houses are fine examples of punk management. The Hipp Theater was among those I visited. During forty minutes I did not see a discoloration of the light; it was well handled and all reels were started in frame. The operating room is about 14 feet long, 6 feet wide, and 8 feet high; two Power's Six-A machines both motor driven. The entrance is through a hole in the floor. The operator, Jack Daley, claims to be getting a fair salary. He is in favor of a union but says the others won't stick. The room was very clean and well ventilated.
> The Princess Theater projects on a mirror screen. The light was very well handled during three reels, but on the fourth there was brown on the bottom almost throughout the entire reel. The speed was well gauged. The operating room was 8 feet wide, 7 feet high and 6 feet deep. There were two Power's Six-A, with a rewinder behind and between the machines; ventilation poor; both machines run by hand. The floor of the room was very loose and the picture on the screen shook every time a man moved. O. Hanson was the operator. He is getting $25 per week, which is not so bad, though the conditions under which he works are far from ideal. The statement as to salary was secured from other sources.
> The Empress is considered as one of the best moving picture theaters in town. I did not see the operating room or the operator, but the projection was by no means all it should have been. The picture was not properly in frame with the black border on the screen, and there was a bad travel ghost. Once the picture was out of frame for several minutes, and three or four times there was discoloration of the light; also, two or three reels were started out of frame. The flicker was something awful.
> The Parlor Theater does not live up to its name; has a very poor front and there is too much light on the inside. Picture was run very slowly and the flicker was, at times, terrific. Both machines hand driven. The reels were started out of frame and the speed was very unsteady. The booth (for booth it is) is 7 x 7 x 7. There were two Edison machines, with the automatic shutters gone, and a Motiograph 1909 model. Operator said he was getting $12 per week and the assistant $7. The lamp leads were No. 8 and the light very weak. I asked him how many amperes he was pulling to which he replied, "Oh, about 110." He would lie back in his chair and crank the machine. The switch-box was over the upper magazine.
> The Cameraphone Theater is another one of the Parlor type. I was there 45 minutes and practically all the time there was discoloration of the light and a bad ghost in the picture. The speed was very unsteady. The operator's salary is $15 a week and his assistant is "Jimmy, the usher," who, I learned, was running the machine while I was in the theater. Equipment: two Edison machines, of the Exhibition type I think, though I did not get a good look at them. The operating room looked to be about 15 feet wide, 6 feet deep and about 8 feet high. The entrance is in the floor between the two machines and is very dangerous.
> The Farnham Theater has a very neat front, and it is well lighted inside. Several times the light was unsteady and there was discoloration three or four times. The picture was out of frame once for several minutes, but the operator was really not to blame for this since a beam in the middle of the room cut off a good view of the screen. A Keystone about as old as I am was projected perfectly, in spite of the terrible rainstorm. The operating room was something like 18 feet long by 7 feet wide and 8 feet high. The operator, L. L. Craig, is to be complimented on the neatness of the room. The two Power's Six machines were perfectly clean, and the tools were neatly placed in a rack. The observation ports were plenty large enough, and the beam was the only fault. Ventilation was fair. Mr. Craig said that a number of would-be operators had tried to get his job at $10 a week; he is getting $18. Hours 10:30 to 5 and 8 to 11, though some days he is off during the evening.
> The Elite No. 2 is another of the Parlor theater type, and here I got a real surprise. Through four reels not once was there a discoloration of the light. The speed was perfect throughout the entire show. All reels were started in frame and kept there. One thing only that could be criticized, and that was not the operator's fault, was that the light from the clock would throw its rays on the screen. The operating room is of good size, and the head operator, Ray Conner, gets $16 a week. The machines are two Edisons which I was told are about seven years old. The condensers in each were purple and badly broken. The gears, too, were in bad shape. He showed me a sprocket just taken off one of the machines, the condition of which was simply awful. That, however, is not the fault of the operator, but of the manager, who will not supply proper repairs. The cam of one of the machines was worn flat in two places. Can you blame me for being surprised at the excellent results he is getting under these conditions. However, he showed me a copy of your Handbook which partly explains the excellence of his work. The operating room has no ventilation, except that which comes through a door.
> The Elite No. 1 has a poor front and the screen is a very shabby affair. The light was well handled and all pictures started in frame. There is one Standard and one Edison machine. The room was very dirty. The operator claims to be getting $18. The wires were No. 8, and the lenses of too short focal length as the picture overlapped the black border fully 6 inches on each side.
> The Palm Theater is owned by the same party as the Elite No. 1. The operator had a very hard time to keep a clear field, and he seemed to be mainly interested in seeing how much noise he could make with the rewind. The machines, two hand-driven Edisons, were dirty, as was also the operating room. The operator's salary is $18 and the helper gets from $7 to $12. This concludes my report on the Omaha theaters. Am sorry I did not get to see any of the suburban houses as I think they are the cause of previous bad reports.

This report was made at the request of the editor. He learned that Brother Kittess was going to Omaha, and asked him to kindly investigate matters. There seems to be a wide difference in salaries, and, judging from what he says, there is immense room for improvement. However, I am glad to know that in several instances his report was good. The Elite man especially is entitled to credit, but the manager evidently has yet to learn that refusing to purchase operating room supplies is the penny-wise and pound-foolish plan. There seems to be an urgent need for an efficient operators' organization in Omaha. There are abuses, and plenty of them, too, which ought by all means to be remedied.

Another Stunt or Two.

W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada, submits the following:

> Any amateur photographer who wishes to make a flashlight of his operating room can succeed by proceeding as follows: Attach an ordinary wall socket to a board. Take a 10 or 15-ampere fuse plug and cut the mica out of the end; or, better still, remove the whole brass end of the fuse. Screw this into the wall socket and fill full of flashlight powder, connecting the same in series with a push-button which is in circuit with his operating switch. He can now stand by his machine, and, after placing the apparatus where he wants it, with the room darkened and the camera shutter open, press the button and take a picture of himself at his machine. Use more sockets and plugs to get a large flash. The lower the amperage of the fuse used the better.

Brother Johnston's flashlight stunt is all right. What he means is to remove the end of a plug fuse of small amperage and fill up the cavity in the fuse with flashlight powder. When this is connected with the arc circuit so as to form a short, the fuse will, of course, blow and touch off the flashlight powder. It would be a simple, efficient stunt, and also one very easily rigged up. Use a 1, 2 or 3-ampere fuse. Bell wire would be heavy enough as the current would only be on for an instant. Brother Johnston sent in another stunt, but space is crowded and I don't think it has much practical value, therefore it "got lost."

Slide Making.

C. D. Smith, Canton, Ill., sends a compact and comprehensive instructions in slide making. He says:

The first thing is to make the negative and we will assume the process of doing this to be understood.

Get a board large enough to cover the bottom half, or at least a portion of a window, say one of the panes of glass; but in that event the glass must be removed. This board is shown in place at D in the illustration. Next cut a hole (C) in the board ¼ inch smaller than the largest negative you intend to use. You can make "kits" of proper size to hold smaller negatives. Next, take a piece of tracing cloth or ground glass and cover the hole (C) on the outside of the board. This is to diffuse the light and illuminate the negative evenly. Now take four screw hooks and screw one at each corner of hole C on the inside, next to the room. This is to hold the negative in place. The little brass or iron hooks used for small brass curtain poles will answer very nicely. One of them is shown in profile at D. They should be screwed in so that when the negative is in place it will be held right up close to the board, directly over and entirely covering hole C. Now, set up your camera, either on a tripod or bench, as shown in illustration, and focus on the negative until you have it sharp, and small enough to just cover the lantern slide plate. (You should mark the size and shape of the lantern slide plate on the ground glass of the camera.) In order to accomplish this you will probably have to move the camera back and forth. Now put a "kit" (this is what we might call a reducer) into your plate holder, the kit being lantern-slide size. Next, you load your kit in the plate holder with a lantern slide positive plate, doing this in the dark room, of course, after which the plate holder is placed in the camera and the exposure made. The exposure will vary according to the light and the density of the negative. It can only be ascertained by experiment. Developing comes next, and the following formulas will be found to give good results.

Developing formula for line or sign work; when you are copying printed matter, use a contrast plate, or one of the slide plates will answer fine:

A—Water, 32 ozs.; hydrochinon, 1½ ozs.; sodium sulphite dry, 1 oz.; sulphuric acid, 60 minims.

B—Water, 32 ozs.; sodium carbonate, dry, 1 oz.; potassium carbonate, 3 ozs.; potassium bromide, 120 grs.; sodium sulphite. dry, 3 ozs.

To develop, take equal parts of A and B. Develop from 6 to 10 minutes; temperature 70° F., according to exposure and density desired.

Another good formula where less contrast is required is: Pure water, 20 ozs.; hydrochinon, 60 grs.; sulphite soda, dry, 120 grs.; bromide of potassium, 6 grs.; citric acid, 6 grs.; carbonate soda, dry, 1 oz. Use this formula just as it is, full strength.

These formulas are given to be used with Cramer plates, and are made up from Cramer sodas, and I find that their Red Label plates give fine results. This same formula will answer just as well with other brands of plates.

I am devoting considerable space to this matter as I think it is one which will prove to be of considerable benefit to many operators and managers. We have to thank Brother Smith for his excellent letter.

Woods Full of Them.

W. G. Woods, San Francisco, California, writes:

If any operator should ask you if there is a good thing waiting for him at the big Worlds Fair at San Francisco, you had better advise him to have a return ticket, or a good pair of shoes, for an operator gets off every train and another one from under it, and this city is facing the problem of providing work, and feeding and lodging some ten thousand unemployed men at the present time.

Operators take notice. This is undoubtedly a simple but plain statement of facts. About the worst place in the world to head for at the present time, and for some time to come, is the city of the Golden Gate.

Connecting the Preddey Economizer.

Walter G. Preddey, San Francisco, California, writes:

Noticed your question concerning method of connecting an economizer with a rheostat, as asked by a Kentucky correspondent: If this economizer is a simple type of transformer having distinct primary and secondary windings, not interconnected, the secondary terminals of which are to run directly to this lamp and one of the line wires feeding the primary is to run directly to one side of a rheostat, and from this rheostat be connected jointly with one of the transforming secondaries to the lamp, the other terminal of the lamp being connected to the other secondary, also to the line, as shown in sketch. You will note by looking at this sketch that there is a path for the current to travel through the rheostat and secondary of the transformer when the lamp is not burning, and that the low resistance of the secondary creates practically a short-circuit, with little current passing the lamp. I have tried this out with a simple transformer connected to a lamp and find that when the resistance is added the current passing the arc is greatly diminished. When a transformer and rheostat of about equal output are used I find that the current at the arc is diminished about 50 per cent., the current from the rheostat setting up a counter magnetic effect in the secondary of the transformer, thus reducing its output. Aside from this the resistance of the small amount of wire on the secondary is much lower than the resistance of the arc, consequently current passing though the rheostat flows through the transformer secondary and not through the arc, and, aside from thus affecting the output of the transformer by setting up counter magnetic waves, which reduce the output, it reduces the arc current and at the same time produces great line load. If the economizer was an ordinary choke coil it could be successfully, although not wholly practical, by reason of the heat loss, connected in multiple with a rheostat, as shown in the sketch.

We are obliged to Brother Preddey for the information. Comment is unnecessary.

From Minneapolis.

I. H. Gray, Minneapolis, Minnesota, asks:

What condenser would you advise with a 9-foot 6-inch picture at 118 feet, and how place them in the machine for best results? The picture now is fairly good and clear, but in looking at same from a distance of 100 feet, or such a matter, it seems to be too far away. What is the cause? All travel ghost is eliminated.

You have about a 10-inch e.f. objective, and I think you ought to have either two 8½ condensers or an 8½ next to the arc and a 9½ in front. Your picture is very small for that distance. I would suggest that if possible you increase it to 12 feet. The condenser lenses should be placed in the holder so they are only about ⅛ of an inch apart at the thickest point. As to the "too far away," however, I think you have my goat there; I don't quite get the idea.

Information Wanted.

J. T. Halloway, Elm Creek, Nebraska, writes:

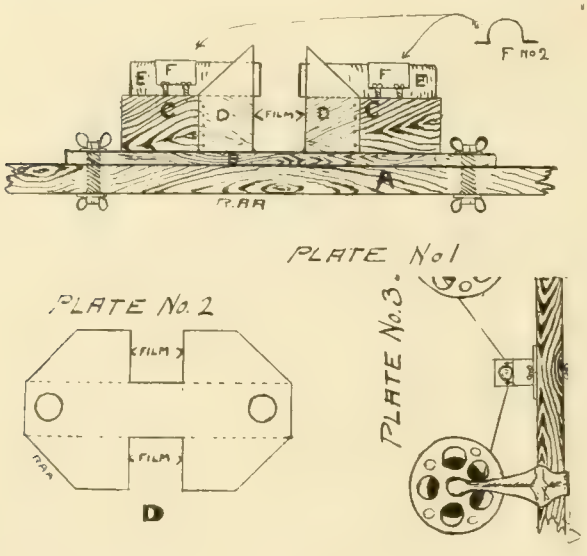
Am running a show in a small town and want a little information. Am using 110-volt d.c. projecting a 12-foot picture at 55 feet with 20 amperes at the arc. What condensers should I use, and am I using sufficient current?

You have about a 4-inch e.f. objective, and I would suggest that you get one 6½ and one 7½ condenser, trying first with the 6½ next to the arc and then with the 7½, using them whichever way you get best results. You will probably have to move your lamp house ahead or back when you change the condenser combination. I would use more current—25 anyhow.

Hughly Pleased.

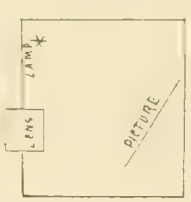
Richard H. Addison, Columbia Theater, Muncie, Indiana, writes:

First I must tell you of my new position (notice I don't say job, but position). The new Columbia is the finest moving picture theater, not only in this city, but, I believe, in the State of Indiana. We have a pipe organ, ventilating system, concrete operating room, two Power's Six-A motor-driven machines and—well it would require columns to tell you about it. I am working on an idea to project post cards, pictures, etc., and I would like to ask you to draw a sketch of a practical way of doing this. In return for which I hand you drawings of a film candler which has been a big help to me, and will be to others who have to contend with first-run films.



I think the sketches will describe it better than I can in words. Plate 1 is a side view; A being the rewind bench, and B the base of the candler. CC are two blocks of wood, upon which lie two large candles EE. FF are galvanized iron clamps which hold the candles firmly to CC by means of the wood screws, as shown. F2 is an end view of the clamps. When you want to move candles EE up back off screws, move the candle up and screw them down again. DD is all one piece of galvanized iron, as shown at D. Plate 2. Cut it in the shape shown, and then cut two holes, one in each end, just large enough to let the candles through. Then bend at the dotted lines and tack it to blocks CC, the opening to be about 1/32 of an inch wider than the film. The candles must project out just far enough to cover the sprocket holes in the film. Plate 3 is an end view of the candler, showing it hooked up with a rewinder, the film rubbing on the candles as you rewind will take just enough of the tallow to prevent the emulsion from sticking to the tension springs.

This candler will doubtless be of real value to operators who are obliged to handle first-run. It ought to be effective, but the candles must not project out far enough to rub on the body of the film—just on the sprocket-hole tracks. I am glad to know you have such a beautiful new house and plant.



The above sketch shows the principle of the post card projector. It is very simple, but the angle of the card to the light and lens must be just right; it can be easily found by experiment.

Out of Focus Effect.

E. E. Wagner, Lamor, Missouri, writes:

Was interested in "Same Old Blunder," January 10th issue, answering question: "Am using a Simplex machine and find that on some scenes in a film it is impossible to get a clear picture, while on others on the same reel the focus is sharp and clear." I think I have discovered the cause of the trouble. If the operator will examine the film closely when this occurs he will find that it is concave, either toward the lens or away from it, and the slightest deviation in either of these directions will throw the picture out of focus.

Your explanation, Brother Wagner, is quite correct in a great many cases, but it is not the answer to all of them, and where the film buckles over aperture it is usually due to worn aperture, or the tension shoes not being properly placed or not set straight up and down, though very dry film has a tendency to buckle under any conditions.

Goodbye Flicker ? ? ?

E. F. Young, San Diego, Cal., writes:

Enclosed find sketch of a device to eliminate flicker. It can be cut out of a piece of tin and the hole in the center will vary with the focal length of the lens. Cut out as per diagram, bend lugs lens jacket, as shown, so that the stop will be between the lens lens' jacket, as shown, so that the stop will be between the lens and the shutter.

Well, Brother Young, I fail to see where this device would have any effect whatever on flicker. It is a stop, or lens reducer, the same in effect as those described and recommended in this department several times, though you have made it in a different and, I think, a better form. It is useful in certain cases in reducing travel ghost and spherical aberration, but as to its having any effect on flicker—well, you would have to show me.

Light Rays.

G. H. Stephens, Sault Ste. Marie, Canada, writes:

On page 354 of the Handbook is a diagram of a light ray which you yourself say you think is not correct and which I have myself found to be wrong. I discovered the error of this diagram by accident. According to the diagram the light rays cross at C, Figure 1; according to my experiments they cross at D, Figure 2. Another thing: The ray from the condensers does not cross anywhere and the ray from the arc is reversed at some point between the arc and the first condenser. If this were not true the spot at the aperture would not be in normal position. The condensers concentrate the light to a spot or point and beyond this point of concentration there is little or no light. You get a faint image of the carbons on the screen, but that is all. To prove this remove the stereopticon lens and hold a piece of tar paper or black tin anywhere you like between the condenser and the screen, and, regardless of the location of the paper, the spot will always be in normal position, thus proving that there is no crossing point in the rays from the condenser. If there was, it stands to reason that the image or spot would be reversed somewhere between the condenser and the screen. And now for the objective lens. According to Figure 1, the picture or slide is supposed to be reversed in projection lens at point C, but to prove this is not the case, hold a piece of tar paper in front of lens at 1, Figure 2, and you will find the picture to be in normal position. Hold the tar paper at 2, Figure 2, and it will be reversed, or as it appears on the screen. By experiment you will find that the distance of the crossing point of the front combination will be whatever the equivalent focus of the lens you are using is. By holding the paper against the back combination of the objective you get a spot something like Figure 3, and the closer the lamphouse is to the aperture the larger will be the square of light, and the farther away the smaller it will be. The farther away the lamphouse the brighter, wider and clearer will be the light. I have improved my light 100 per cent. by my experiments. Am using a 7½ lens next to the arc and a 6½ in front. The rear condenser should always be a 7½ so as to keep the arc in proper position. Where I now have my lamphouse I can get a 3-inch spot without the slightest trace of ghost. No matter what the distance of the lamphouse from the aperture may be the crossing point of the light ray is exactly the same distance from the front of the front combination.

Well, neighbor Stephens, I dunno. I have printed your letter with a view of bringing out further discussion. I don't think any of us are quite certain what does take place in the lens—yet. I am sure I don't. Therefore, I shall not comment on this matter at present, but leave it to enterprising operators, who are conducting experiments. I think in course of time our combined reasoning and experiments will evolve a correct understanding of what really takes place in the various lenses.

Improvement in Projection.

One of the principal reasons for the comparative slowness of improvement in projection lies in the lack of encouragement to the operator by the exhibitor and manager. While it is a fact that all too many managers, even in this advanced day, absolutely do not know the difference between high-class and mediocre results on their screens, still, even those managers and exhibitors who are able to differentiate, and who understand the value, from the box office point of view, of that last little touch which means the difference between mediocre and high-class results are unwilling to encourage the operator to produce high-class results by adding a little something to his pay envelope. It is a discouraging thing to an operator, who has studied, experimented and worked hard, and who knows that his labors have borne fruit in production of results on his screen, to step into another house and find a brother operator who has not done these things, and who is producing mediocre results, receiving the same weekly stipend that he finds in his own envelope.

"Aha," I think I hear some wise manager say to me, "Now I have got you where I want you. You have in the past done a lot of boosting for the operators' union, and that is principally what the operators' union demands—a flat wage scale. The union does not differentiate in its wage scale as between the good and the bad."

To this I reply by saying that the manager who takes this view merely displays the fact that he has not grasped the idea of the wage scale at all. The union does not, never has, and, I presume never will adopt a flat wage scale for everybody. It simply says to the manager: here is a wage scale below which you must not go; our poorest men are worth that sum or nothing at all; in other words, you must pay them that sum or don't employ them. But, my dear Mr. Manager, like a game of poker in the West, the blue sky is the limit of the wage scale in the other direction.

The schedule of the New York union averages, if I remember right, about $25 per week. Now, do you imagine for one minute that you could employ the editor of this department to operate the projector in your theater for $25 a week, even if he needed the job? If you do you have another guess coming. You would have to pay him a whole lot more than the wage scale, or you would have to deprive yourself of his distinguished services indefinitely. The wage scale only operates one way, therefore, when you get a good operator who projects high-class instead of mediocre results on your screen, just remember that fact and encourage him by paying him a few dollars above what his mediocre competitor, who is not really worth the wage scale, receives. Otherwise he has no reason, other than that of professional pride, to continue to deliver any better results than the other fellow delivers. Realizing that high-class work increases the reputation of your house and therefore its box-office receipts, pay back a dribble of the added revenue thus brought to you, and this high-class result will continue. Moreover, let me tell you, Mr. Manager, that projection would improve enormously and quickly if you did exercise plain, ordinary, good sense and encourage it by added pay.

Counter Shafting.

E. T. Young, San Diego, California, writes:

> Replying to B. W. Davidson's letter, January 10th issue, such a counter-shafting and method of operating machines is entirely practical. I have myself used such a device in conjunction with a special system of wiring whereby, with one motor-generator, compensarc, rheostat, rectifier, or other appliance, for stepping down the current for projectors, a continuous picture can be kept on the screen without the least interruption. I have equipped several operating rooms and have the molds for the castings, and can have them turned out and delivered with a small profit to myself cheaper than any one could have them made. I would be willing to supply as many of these as I could, but my capacity for making them is limited. If any of your readers so desire I will be glad to send blue prints at small charge to cover the trouble of making them. Upon receipt of addressed, stamped envelope, together with description of their set-up, make of machine and type of resistance, I will be glad to inform inquirers precisely what equipment will be necessary and the approximate cost of same.

In a proppsition of this kind I give the address because the demand for this sort of thing is at present too limited to enable him to advertise, and at the same time there are cases where such a device is needed. It can be supplied by Brother Young, and also by W. G. Woods, Market Street Theater, San Francisco, Cal.

A Book I Can Recommend.

Recently I took the librarian of the New York Public Library to task by reason of the fact that I was unable to find elementary works on electricity in that great institution—books which the average man could understand. The librarian replied to my criticism by saying that he would withdraw from circulation, and hold for my inspection, all elementary works on electricity in the library. This was done and I took a great pile of them home and spent one whole day in examination. Out of the whole bunch I only found one elementary work, but it was a very, very good one, indeed. It is called, "The Electric Motor and Its Practical Operation," by Elmer E. Burns. This book I can most heartily recommend to operators. I do not know its price, but those wishing to purchase may send me a letter, enclosing a postal card giving address, and request for information, and I will forward same to the publisher.

The book contains 167 pages of text matter and it is so plainly written that a child could understand it. I would advise all operators to get a copy of this and "Lessons in Practical Electricity," by Swoope. I think that these two books, in connection with my own Handbook, will serve the purpose of the operator fairly well.

I found two other books which, while I cannot recommend operators to purchase either one of them, still, if they can be found in public libraries, they contain a little fairly understandable matter, viz: "Alternating Current Machines," by Sheldon, and "Dynamo Electric Machinery," by Sheldon and Hausman. The first named has a little elementary information on the mercury vapor converter, (mercury arc rectifier) on page 296. There is also a brief explanation of induction motor action on page 202, and methods of connecting transformers on page 181, with a little information on choke coils on page 144. The last named book has some good general information, pages 1 to 24, on units, resistance, and insulating materials. There is also considerable other valuable matter in this book, but most of it is too technical to be understood by the layman.

Information Wanted.

Westbrook, Connecticut, makes the following inquiry:

> Am running a one night a week show on the style of "Village Improvement Society," and am to give a minstrel show the first of next month. Can I get any sort of a spot for my outfit? Also can I get a general illumination of the minstrel circle by borrowing a wide angle stereopticon lens?

You can undoubtedly rent a regular spot light from one of the film exchanges, or from J. H. Hallberg, 36 West 23d Street, New York City. You can make a tin slide for your stereo slide holder, and, by cutting a suitable opening therein, can get almost any size and shape spot you want up to the size of the slide itself. If your present lens won't cover the stage you can get one of shorter focal length. First, put a carboard slide in and, with the light on, punch holes in it with a pin until you find the point where you want the center of the spot to be. Using that as a center you can lay out your circle with a compass and the size of the spot will vary according to the size of the hole in the cardboard. Then, when you get your cardboard slide made, all you have to do is to use it for your pattern and cut a duplicate slide out of tin. You may have to raise or lower your stereopticon lens in order to bring the spot in the right position.

More Poor Work.

Monday, January 19th, I entered the City Theater on 14th Street about 5:30. The above theater is a 25-cent house, using a combination program of moving pictures and vaudeville. Up until about 6:30 the light was brilliant and well handled. Only once or twice did I see a very faint shadow on the screen, and then only for a few seconds. Sometime between 6:30 and 7:00, however, this good work stopped and I discovered afterwards another operator came on duty at about that time. From that time on the work was vile. Two or three times shadows crept up until almost half the picture was discolored, and the lower portion almost entirely obliterated. This continued all the evening.

There is absolutely no excuse for work of this kind, at any time or under any conditions, but how much less excusable is the operator who has a good rest between reels while vaudeville acts are on. I do not know who the operator on duty was. He may know—he may be well posted and all that, but if he is, then all the more shame to him. We can find some excuse, though not much, for the man who is doing the best he can, and fails through lack of knowledge, but the fellow who knows and is too infernally lazy to watch his projection and prevent shadows on the screen is, it seems to me, beyond hope.

Sizing the Canvas.

Leon W. Gant, Albany, New York, writes:

> On page 409, January 24th issue, under heading "Screen Coating," you told W. F. Bentley to use a glue size. I would suggest that he stretch his canvas or unbleached muslin on a frame and then by sprinkling with plain water he can get it tighter than he otherwise could. After it has dried, if he will size the back side with a good, stiff size of starch, using the same while hot, and then apply two coats of alabastine, or its equivalent, he will make a more even job.

Your amendment to the original motion is accepted, Brother Gant. Undoubtedly you are correct; at least I am willing to assume that this is the case, unless it is proven otherwise.

Take-Up Device.

Crook & Myers, West Branch, Iowa, write:

> Has there not been any satisfactory take-up device other than the friction disc arrangement invented for the projector? If not, what is the difficulty?

There has, though no such device is as yet on the market. The difficulty was to secure some device which would be positive in its action and yet secure an absolutely even pull on the film throughout the process of rewinding. Added to this, however, is the necessity that the device be simple—that is to say not too complicated. It is a simple matter to get an even pull on the take-up reel, but to cause the reel to impart an equal pull to the film—well, that was something else again.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

WHIFFLE'S BALCONY BUDS (Pathe), Feb. 17.—A very amusing little comedy which involves Whiffles in all kinds of trouble just when he imagines himself in the seventh heaven, having just engaged himself to the girl of his choice. It is not his fault, though only an unfortunate circumstance. It is well handled and directed. The plot is not hackneyed. It caused much laughter.

RAMBLES IN BURGES, FRANCE (Pathe), Feb. 17.—On the same reel is this scenic picture; a very beautiful offering.

TO ALASKA VIA THE GREAT RIVERS OF THE NORTH (Essanay), Feb. 17.—This scenic picture is very interesting and shows the strenuous methods of deporting supplies to the far north. The portaging of the boats from one river to the other, sixteen miles, over the mountains with horses, pulleys, log rollers, etc., is very edifying and instructive.

GETTING EVEN (Lubin), Feb. 17.—Written by Frank C. Griffin and produced by A. D. Hotaling. It is a very amusing comedy, and concerns the adventures of two young clerks on a day's outing. The action is rapid and laughable, the parts well sustained. Jerry Hevener, Raymond McKee, Hazel Smith, Francis Ne Moyer, and Marguerite Ne Moyer made up the cast. It caused great laughter and will please any audience.

SOPHIA'S IMAGINARY VISITORS (Edison), Feb. 17.—This is a Booth Tarkington story and is used as the foundation for this picture. It was directed by Walter Edwin. Marc MacDermott, Marion Nesbitt, Mrs. William Bechtel, Sigfried Schultz, Robert Harvey, and little Edna Hammel were the principals in the cast. The plot is quite original and hinges on the vivid imagination of a little crippled girl. The senator (Mr. Marc MacDermott), indulges her in her fantasies and incurs the suspicions of his neighbors that he is "daffy." There are several very touching scenes, also some laughable ones. It is a splendid picture in all respects.

THROUGH THE CENTURIES (Selig), Feb. 17.—This is an original idea, written by L. J. Withers and produced by Fred W. Huntly with Harold Lockwood, Henry W. Otto and Mabel Van Buren in the cast as principals. The plot hinges on suspended animation and reincarnation. Two young American archaeologists in research in Egypt, while excavating a tomb, discover a princess who had been buried 2,000 years—think of it. Visions appear to one, and then the trouble begins. It is an interesting picture, whether you believe it or not. It is well lighted and acted and it seemed to please.

AN INNOCENT VICTIM (Lubin), Feb. 17.—Written by E. W. Sargent and produced by A. D. Hotaling. It occupies the same reel with "Getting Even" and is quite funny, though it reminds one of an old farce. Sam, the colored butler, has been helping himself to the doctor's (his master) best whiskey, and gets a dose of tartar emetic, which the doctor puts into the decanter to teach Sam a lesson, as does a friend of the doctor's by mistake. This causes all the comedy situations. Ed. Lawrence, John Edwards, Mattie Edwards, Walter Heirs, Billy Belts and Julia Calhoun make the most of their parts. The doctor is forced to take a dose of his own concoction. A fine comedy.

COURTING BETTY'S BEAU (Edison), Feb. 18.—This little comedy, by A. Van Buren Powell, made some laughter, but not so much as it should have. It is fresh enough and is built on a good idea, but the way the older sisters crowd out Betty when her beau calls is a bit too crude to please. At best it is a comedy of understanding and not of sympathy; it has a touch of bitterness. Yet it makes a fair offering. Charles M. Seay produced it.

ONE TO THREE (Essanay), Feb. 18.—A farce that made them laugh. Three men (Billy Mason, Wallace Beery and Leo White), happy, hall-room boys who live together, get acquainted with three pretty daughters of a clothing manufacturer who is very rich. An invitation to a ball finds them unable to hire more than one dress suit and their comical adventures in trying to have all three enjoy a part of the ball makes the fun.

WON BY A NOSE (Pathe), Feb. 18.—The relationship between the girl's nose bleed and the locked door didn't get over very strongly to this reviewer, who didn't even know that the key of the door was used to help the patient. It is played in a lively way and there was some laughter.

MONUMENTS OF UPPER EGYPT (Pathe), Feb. 18.—On the same reel with the foregoing, this picture of interesting ruins is clearly photographed and is surely a commendable offering. It has some scenic quality as well as being educational.

THOU SHALT NOT KILL (Selig), Feb. 18.—Scenes lack semblance of life and burden our interest both on account of camera work in general and of the business. They may be realistic, but will hardly convince as such, except in one or two vigorously handled scenes like that in which the girl separates the two young men who are gunning for each other. The story is of the slightest and practically unbelievable, but its main drift is interesting.

FATTY ON THE JOB (Vitagraph), Feb. 18.—Hughy Mack, as a country fat boy with a great tendency to fall asleep, made laughter, as did his exasperated dad. The picture stands fairly well in these two characters.

LUMBERING IN SWEDEN (Vitagraph), Feb. 18.—An industrial giving us some interesting views of what is perhaps the largest lumbering plant in the world, that at Bomus, in Sweden. While not perfect, the camera work is fair. It is on the same reel with the foregoing.

THE FIRST INDORSEMENT (Vitagraph), Feb. 19.—A patriotic military episode in India, with Charles Kent, Dorothy Kelly and others in the principal roles. The photography is very pleasing and the settings are good. A portion of the son's story seemed merely repetition of what had gone before, but the story is an unusually well-acted one.

A DESPERATE HERO (Biograph), Feb. 19.—The young husband, who is afraid of a rat in a trap, pretends to save the women from a bad man named Red Ned. Some very laughable situations result.

SKELLEY AND THE TURKEY (Biograph), Feb. 19.—This, on same reel with above, contains some hilarious moments. Skelley and his partner have a lot of fun in the shooting gallery and furnish some good amusement for the audience. A pleasing comedy reel.

ITALIAN LOVE (Essanay), Feb. 19.—In this number Reina Valdez appears as an Italian girl, whose popularity with numerous admirers leads them into hand-to-hand conflict. The characters were not very clear in the minds of the observers, and one or two sub-titles would have helped the film. It makes a very passable release, however.

VENUS AND ADONIS (Selig), Feb. 19.—A comedy number of a slightly burlesque type, in which a woman in a bathing suit and a man in a barrel are rescued from a rocky coast. Children playing pirates add to the picturesqueness of the scene, but the half reel is not very strong.

A MAD MARATHON (Selig), Feb. 19.—Brown's manner of reducing his weight is quite amusing. He is chased by a lunatic and loses 150 pounds as a result. This is amusing in spots. On same reel with above.

TOO MANY JOHNNIES (Kalem), Feb. 20.—A funny little skit, in which Johnny is placed in the reform school for a year. When his uncle comes it was necessary to find a substitute, but too many turned up. A pleasing half reel.

A BOTTLED ROMANCE (Kalem), Feb. 20.—This, on same reel with above, is a yarn about a girl who sends out a message in a bottle. Many would-be lovers turn up at the meeting point specified and there is a swift race through a seaside resort, numerous concessions being pressed into service, including the figure eight and miniature train. An entertaining number.

MEMORIES (Selig), Feb. 20.—This reel gives an interesting demonstration of how girls sometimes go into convent life after being separated from their lovers by over-ambitious parents. It is an unusual story in some ways, but the development is not at all times clear, and for this reason it does not get up a great deal of feeling.

IN THE DREDGER'S CLAW (Lubin), Feb. 20.—Seeing is believing in a plot of this kind, and the heroine who catches a bad man in the jaws of the dredge performs what is certainly a novel feat. The story is interesting and this feature alone makes the reel an unusual one. The scenes are laid along a lumber dock.

HIS LITTLE PAGE (Vitagraph), Feb. 20.—A comedy number, in which the young artist attires his wife as a boy page in order to deceive his uncle, who is opposed to matrimony. Not a very new idea, but handled in an enjoyable manner. Van Dyke Brooke, Norma Talmadge and Leo Delaney are in the cast. The photography is excellent.

A WINNING MISTAKE (Lubin), Feb. 21.—Rather amusing but not original as far as the plot is concerned, as another licensed company released a comedy many months ago with which it is identical in almost every respect. The opening scenes are somewhat different, but after-developments groove into the same denouement. It is amusing, however, and won considerable laughter.

A FEMALE BOOK AGENT (Lubin), Feb. 21.—On the same reel is a comedy with the above caption that is original and meritorious. It shows the persistence of the proverbial book agent in his struggle for life. This has to do with a female agent, who is offered $100 bonus if she will sell a book to a crank. How she wins is interesting and amusing. Mae Hotely almost broke her neck to win that hundred.

CRIMINOLOGY AND REFORM (Biograph), Feb. 21.—This photoplay shows how parents become interested in fads and clubs to the neglect of their own children—a responsibility which should be paramount above every other obligation. There is a clever little girl character left in the care of a frivolous nurse while the father goes out to lecture on criminology and the mother on reform. The child is taken sick while the nurse is galavanting with a patrolman. The criminal whose photograph is used by the father as an illustration of viciousness, burglarizes the house and discovers the little one's condition. At the risk of his being apprehended he telephones for a physician. This teaches a good lesson to parents.

THE POWERS OF THE AIR (Edison), Feb. 21.—A novel and original plot, introducing the intrinsic value of the wireless. The various scenes embrace a perspective view and the inside workings of a lighthouse, also coast views that are bright and true to nature. It is considerably melodramatic in action and in many places shows poor direction and lack in detail. The acting is up to the standard. William West, Sallie Crute, Richard Mill and Martin Faust played the leading parts.

SNAKEVILLE'S FIRE BRIGADE (Essanay), Feb. 21.—This is really a very amusing comedy. The plot revolves around a village board, who purchase a chemical fire engine, with instructions to keep in a cool place. The scenes are "truly rural." The great fire scene and the engine house scene were immense. The bartender as a "ringer up" works hard enough to deserve a salary. This is a good offering.

AN INDIAN'S HONOR (Kalem), Feb. 21.—A rather pretty and interesting Indian offering which contains much scenic merit. The plot follows the lines of many other Western pictures; treachery induced by greed of gold leading to murder, false accusation, etc. The Indian police figure prominently in the development of the plot. The real Indian actors deserve credit for their natural work, as do the others in the cast. Rex Downs makes a mentionable fall from a runaway horse. It will please.

A LONG ISLAND SKUNK FARM (Kalem), Feb. 21.—Skunk raising might not appeal strongly as a pleasant occupation until you see this picture. Of course, they are raised for their fur. The picture shows that they are very docile under kind treatment. On the same reel with "An Indian's Honor."

HER FATHER'S SILENT PARTNER (Biograph), Feb. 23.—Crook melodrama, not at all artistic, but with action all through. The photography is not perfect, but not poor enough to hinder the clearness of the story. It can safely be counted an interesting picture and is of the kind liked by the uncritical.

THE BEAUTIFUL LEADING LADY (Edison), Feb. 23.—Third of the Wood B. Wed dseries and the audience counted it a scream; there was hearty laughter all over the house. Mark Swan is the author and it was directed by C. Jay Williams. Wood (William Wadsworth) proposes to the beautiful leading lady of the traveling troupe and her smiles cost him plenty of his money. He becomes leading man until a good house gathers to see the show and when he acts they take him out and tar and feather him. In the shuffle he loses the beautiful leading lady (Mrs. C. Jay Williams).

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 16.—The photography is poor, but the items are of much interest.

IN THE OLD ATTIC (Vitagraph), Feb. 23.—Very improbable story, but with likable and popular elements that make it entertaining. The acting is acceptable, but with the exception of Charles Kent's old aristocratic gentleman, it never strikes fire or becomes convincing. A fair offering.

Licensed Specials.

THE ARTIST'S MODEL (Celio-Kline), Feb. 17.—This is a two-part drama with some beautiful domestic scenes and carries with it an interesting story worked out in a clever manner. It demonstrates the shallowness of a woman's nature, who has been taken, a shepherdess, from the sheep pastures and introduced into city environments, by an artist who marries her and devotes his whole life to trying to make her happy. She ruins him financially with her extravagances. The inevitable rich man comes between them. A divorce follows and the wife marries the banker. The first husband courts dissipation. The ending is misty and left to the imagination of the spectator. It is a well acted picture. Francis Berlani, Harry Lester and Albert Collins are the principals.

BACK TO BROADWAY (Vitagraph), Feb. 17.—This two-reel picture production is one among the best long comedies that has been thrown on the screen for many moons. Anita Stewart, as Bessie Williams, a manacurist, falls a victim to her own beauty and joins an opera troupe, which closes suddenly in an unsympathetic one night stand town. A young millionaire figures through the action, who has been a former patron of Bessie's. He is on a yachting tour, but has been called back to city on important business. He loses his "grip" with his money and ticket in it. He and Bessie meet accidently in the town where she is stranded, and the comedy grows around the "busted" millionaire who, unshaven, is taken for a beat and isn't allowed to stop in a hotel. Bessie helps him out, and afterward he reciprocates, and "back to Broadway" for both. The titles are very funny. A good production.

CHASING THE SMUGGLERS (Kalem), Feb. 18.—A two-part offering produced by Carlyle Blackwell, but with a story far below the standard set by Kalem. It was taken mostly against the placid waters of a sound or large harbor and utilizes both motor boats and flying machines. The photography is poor. It is not a strong picture and can hardly be popular.

THE PRICE OF A RUBY (Lubin), Feb. 18.—A pretty melodrama of pathos with many lively scenes in which artfully made sets and fine photography play an important part. The author, Eleanor Kinkhead, in putting the play together, has shown wakeful sympathy with the heart of the public, and, using the dear, old things that we all like in a picture, has succeeded in making a decidedly pleasant impression. The players—Rosemary Theby and Harry Myers in the leads—do commendably and help a great deal. The story deals with the great sorrow a theft of a ruby brings to a young woman. She is not prosecuted, but has to toil for long years in privation in order to make up for the theft and become worthy of happiness. It will be liked everywhere. Harry Myers directed it.

THE HOUSE OF FEAR (Lubin), Feb. 19.—An old-fashioned haunted house story, written by Emmett Campbell Hall. The photography is good and the acting of John E. Ince and Rosette Brice was sincere and convincing. The plot is one in which the lawyer defrauds the dying widow and confiscates the property which should have gone to the niece. As a result the lawyer is continually haunted by fears. The ghost of the widow is thrown on the screen by means of double exposure photography. This is a good offering of its particular kind and holds the interest throughout.

WHERE THE HEART CALLS (Pathe), Feb. 19.—A very entertaining two-reel number, with Gaston Mervale, Lillian Wiggins, Florence Dyer and Charles Seymour in the cast. An adventuress named Ruth plays fast and loses with the hero. After Drake's marriage she comes again into his life. The opening scenes were somewhat choppy, but the story gets a good hold on the interest. The scene between the wife and the doctor, when the latter informs her of her approaching maternity was delicately handled. The bridge scene contains some real thrills and as a whole the production is quite a strong one.

ALL FOR HIS SAKE (Edison), Feb. 20.—A two-reel number, written by Bannister Merwin. Augustus Phillips, Benj. F. Wilson, Gertrude McCoy and Marc McDrmott are in the cast. The story is well pictured and shows the manner in which a young wife steals her father's jewels to aid her husband in meeting a financial obligation. The husband lost sympathy when he choked his wife in a jealous passion, and this made the reconciliation scene a little weak. The production maintains a good hold on the interest, however.

THE OTHER GIRL (Essanay), Feb. 20.—A two-reel number featuring Francis X. Bushman and Ruth Stonehouse. The ambitious mother intercepts the note from the girl her son loves. An estrangement results and she tries to make a match between her son and another girl. The scenes in the Salvation Army headquarters, when the first girl finds her undelivered note in an old dress, are very touching. The photography is smooth and pleasing, but a little dark at times. A good story of an interrupted love affair, with a happy ending.

IRON AND STEEL (Vitagraph), Feb. 21.—This two-reel photoplay is very creditable and holds the interest of the spectator. The plot is considerably intricate and illustrates the difficulties a young inventor is forced to contend with in exploiting his invention—a mounted rapid-fire gun. Through the machinations of a fellow workman, who steals his drawings and sells them to his employer he comes to grief, temporarily. By the accidental meeting of the sweetheart of his employer's daughter, who befriends him, he wins out, as does his new found friend. The former perfidious workman testifies in his favor also; whether is is to get even or otherwise is left to the imagination. Maurice Costello and Mary Charleston played the leads. The entire cast was adequate. A good production, though misty in places.

THE SHADOW (Kalem), Feb. 23).—A pretty, graceful picture made with little regard for the probabilities in the main thread of the story, but with plenty of action and no dragging. One can see in it, too, as in the eye-glasses left behind, an attempt to make it smooth and natural. The acting is acceptable rather than especially strong and the players make many of its scenes truly lovely. It will hold interest and with its general grace, perfect settings anl life-like photography is a safe guess to an exhibitor.

THE DEVIL'S ASSISTANT (Pathe), Feb. 26.—A strong two-part picture featuring Asta Neilson and in which she shows that kind of acting that has won her the reputation she enjoys. What is more, we seldom see a film story with so much that is deeply significant and at the same time is so clear and simple that every heart that has felt pain can fully understand it. There is no padding in it. After the situation is once clear, the action proceeds logically and naturally to a passionate climax. It is an offering that will make its mark on every audience and will be talked about. From the spectator's viewpoint, on account of its new story, its dramatic plot, its interesting characters and its acting, its staging and photography, a most worthy picture.

THE PARASITES (Pathe), Feb. 28.—M. O. Penn gives in this two-reel offering an emotional portrayal of a father who has sent his only son away with the stern intention of making him brace up and be something, and who has heard that he is dead. This is the best thing the picture has, though the story is fairly novel, is touched with a sense of the romantic and interests, in spite of its great improbability. It has been carefully produced and its scenes, taking them one by one, or in single groups, are strong. The plot, which makes us see how, after the son, the father is fleeced by the same woman who is "shown up" in the last act by the son's unexpected return, fails to make the two stories dramatically one whole. The photography is of high order and makes some lovely pictures.

Independent.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, No. 102 (Universal), Feb. 18.—Blizzard scenes in New York, a straw hat parade in San Diego, skating scenes in Newburgh, N. Y., ballooning in California, and other entertaining items make up this number.

A BIRTHDAY PRESENT (Komic), Feb. 19.—Clown characters make fun by comic tumbling and eccentric actions. Acceptably played.

GETTING A SUIT PRESSED (Komic), Feb. 19.—On same reel with the foregoing this lively clown farce has good, though not fresh, situations. The players are amusing and the two on the one reel ought to get by well.

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL (Princess), Feb. 20.—A criss-cross love story with little suspense, but with a broad humor without finesse running through it. The situation is rather meaningless and impossible. Not especially strong on anything.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL NO. 6 (Reliance), Feb. 23.—In this installment we have excellent series of views of Mauretania, also of the Wall Street Curb, of the Woolworth Building with some dandy "panorams" of the city. The story makes just a step of progress. The photography is fair at times and fails in one or two places. There is no advertising in this number.

THE RIVAL DENTISTS (Powers), Feb. 23.—A comedy number, with Lee Moran appearing as business rival of the girl's father. His painless dentistry attracts most of the trade and he finally has to treat his rival's teeth. Considerable amusement is worked up by the various situations and the scenes are all well pictured.

THE MUSICIAN'S WIFE (Reliance), Feb. 25.—The author of this story got little sense of reality into it and it doesn't convince, but it interests, for it keeps moving. The acting is weak; the photography fair.

LITTLE BILLY'S CITY COUSIN (Keystone), Feb. 26.—A picture of a serious flirtation by child players. The kids are cute and the melodrama amusing. This kind of offering is well known. In this case the quality is good and the photography acceptable. It ought to be pleasing.

THEIR BEST FRIEND (Thanhouser), Feb. 27.—A good picture. An unusual love story with a villainous uncle in the background—he has speculated with the fortune of his ward and fears exposure. He doesn't intend to let her marry and it is the real brass of his new kind of villainy that, in the excellent character drawing of this part, is the big interest of the offering. All the characters, but especially this uncle, are drawn with vigor and seem to us like real human beings full of interest. The picture ought to make a very good offering. It will be liked.

TRAFFIC IN SOLES (Joker), Feb. 28.—There is abundant material for good comedy in this, if handled delicately and by a selected cast. As presented, however, it is full of vulgarity and contains nothing of a commendable nature. Such business as pouring slop over a character and smelling decayed fish should never appear in the films; dirty, unattractive scenery and wearing apparel are also a serious drawback.

THE RIVAL BARBERS (Majestic), Feb. 28.—Rough farce with eccentric characters. It has the usual broad humor and one or two touches of vulgarity. Such pictures are built for a well-defined kind of spectator and are likely to satisfy all others.

THE SCIENTIST'S DOLL (Thanhouser), March 1.—Many spectators will count this picture just foolishness—it is childish. Its very improbability is the one thing that makes it interesting. As light entertainment it should make a fair offering.

VILLAGE SCHOOL DAYS (Apollo), March 1.—Fred Mace as an overgrown country school boy is the center of this burlesque farce which is an elaborated vaudeville sketch. It has the broad humor found in this kind of picture and will make laughter especially among the simple. The photography is clear enough.

THE WEAKER SISTER (Rex), March 1.—This is quite a strong story, with Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley in the leads. The old situation in which the actress sacrifices herself to save the reputation of another is brought out here, but is given a fresh twist at the end. This holds the interest and is well constructed.

THE HEART OF CARITA (Eclair), March 1.—A Western offering, with characteristic Arizona settings, in which J. W. Johnston appears as the new sheriff. The daughter of the Mexican brigand saves him from death and he, of course, falls in love with her. This is better than the ordinary Western release.

HOW MOSHA CAME BACK (Crystal), March 1.—This is a prize-fighting number, with an ordinary brand of humor in it. Mosha, the Yiddish fighter, wins a victory after taking a hypodermic treatment in one of his legs. Fight fans will perhaps enjoy this film, though it is not a very strong offering.

THE CRUCIBLE (American), March 2.—Opens with a beautiful picture of a ship coming into harbor and then introduces to us a young Irishman immigrant. It then turns to some Americans of means and begins a love story with the object of showing how we are all being melted up together in the crucible. The hero grows up to be a power in city politics and there is a graft episode to prove his moral courage. In this part of the story there is snap. As a whole, it will go fairly well. It has popular elements, has been cleverly produced and the acting and camera work are natural.

A FILM JOHNNIE (Keystone), March 2.—Edgar English's work in this picture will keep it amusing. There are many good situations, fresh and laughable, and the offering ought to be welcome everywhere as a lightener of the program. Camera work helps a lot.

THE MAN BETWEEN (Victor), March 2.—This reel features Warren Kerrigan and Cleo Madison. The young man was adopted as a foundling and when he has reached man's estate he learns that his father was a thief. Then begins his battle with himself. Two women, one good and the other bad, figure in this fight, and in the end the good one wins. The photography in this reel is not of the best, but the story is quite interesting and sincerely presented.

SOME PULL (Crystal), March 3.—The gouty father is pulled upstairs with a rope and allowed to fall down again. The amusement depends entirely upon several incidents of this nature.

A STRANGE BIRD (Crystal), March 3.—On same reel with above. Belmont, who jokingly pretends to be another visitor, gets himself tarred and feathered as a result. The photography is good, but the story not of an extremely amusing type.

UNIVERSAL IKE GETS A GOAT (Joker), March 3.—Ike and Cayuse Pete are rivals in love and the girl promises to go to the party with the one that gets her the prettiest dress. The comedy in this works up quite pleasingly in places. Ike dresses up as a goat and gets into considerable trouble. This is the first of the new Universal Ike series, which promises to be a good one.

SHERIDAN'S PRIDE (Joker), March 4.—This burlesque story of warfare, written by Grace Cunard, contains some interesting scenes and is presented by a large cast of people. There is no basic plot interest, however, and for this reason the film is weak. The elephant pushing the automobile out of difficulty was an unusual scene.

MARIO (Broncho), March 4.—A lovely picture of a tragic love story set in Italy and an offering that surely will be liked. It is a well planned and rounded out production and has behind it not only a wider and deeper knowledge of life than the average spectator's, but also that sense of what is significant that differentiates the real artist from the mere commercial workman. Human sympathies and a wakeful sense of the realities of life are very apparent and make all that is in the picture interesting. The producer shows skill in his choice of his players. Their acting rings true and makes the story the more convincing. The story itself is quite believeable. A desirable offering.

THE PERSUER PERSUED (American), March 5.—A lively ranch love story with a vein of good comedy running through it. Its dandy backgrounds, its convincing sense of romance, its natural acting and the feeling of suspense in the action make it an excellent offering. The photography is commendable.

THE HAND THAT RULES THE WORLD (Powers), March 6.—This drama, by Edwin August, with himself in the leading role, deals with the woman who does not wish to become a mother; a delicate theme to handle. No one will quarrel with the solution as here presented. But the story could have been told with greater clearness and better effect if a little more care had been exercised in writing sub-titles.

A CHILD OF THE DESERT (American), March 7.—A love story of rough but human hearts; it ought to make a very fair offering. The same situations and sentiments have been used in other offerings. They are of the kind that never grow trite and we have never seen them used as effectively as in this story without the picture's being a decided success. The staging and the camera work are commendable.

Independent Specials

PARADISE LOST (Great Northern).—A four-reel special featuring Betty Nansen, whose work makes the picture a commendable offering. All the characters are interesting, but the story is weak and meaningless, except that Miss Nansen's playing persuades us that the emotions are actually felt in spite of lack of logical humanity in what causes them. It is poorly named. What the discontented wife of the detective, who is too busy on an important case to give her any of his attention, loses by her willful infatuation for the strange young man is not Paradise to her and it is not shown that she ever realized that it could be. The staging and photography, as is usual with pictures of this kind, are both life-like and distinguished.

CONVICT 113 (Itala).—A two-part picture of human hearts that is especially fine on account of its portrayal of an exceptionally lasting and strong tenderness between husband and wife. The acting is perfect. The closing situation brings into play before us what must have been—it is natural to consider the story as real life—almost the ultimate of human courage. So the high quality of what the picture shows adds to its merit. Not all that transpires in the story is convincing, but the outline is of little importance in a case where the filling is of a kind like this. A desirable offering.

A BURIED SECRET (Itala).—A two-part detective tale with a good love story in the background. It is sensational, the incidents follow each other with enough snap, and are played in interesting backgrounds. It is acted as it should be. A very fair offering.

THE STRUGGLE OF THE STRONG (Louis Pennent).—A three-part feature offering with a love story of which the ending is a bit morbid. The title does not convey any meaning, for there is nothing heroic in it nor is there any tense struggle. An artist's rich friend bets that he can induce his wife, a one-time Moulin Rouge favorite, to return to the dancing hall. A duel with the husband is the result and the husband is killed. The wife comes back to the Moulin Rouge to get the money the rich man offers, then kills herself at the bier of the dead husband.

THE REFORMED CANDIDATE (Majestic), Feb. 22.—A three-reel offering that is a pretty safe guess as an entertainer, although in no sense a work of art. It is an over-drawn melodrama for which its author has chosen city politics for a background. Its hero is a reformer (Lamar Johnstone) who is so engrossed with his mission that he neglects his wife (Francelia Billington). On the other side of the picture is the boss, who has the reformer's secretary in his employ and who hires an adventuress to excite the wife's jealousy. It will be exciting to the gallery and to many people downstairs. It is not artistic and lacks finesse, both in construction and in presentation. There are some excellent scenes, especially in the office of the boss, and it is clearly photographed.

THE GREEN-EYED DEVIL (Reliance), Feb. 28.—A two-reel picture that keeps a fairly complicated situation clear and stirs our sympathies for a young married woman with much to contend with. Her husband is a drunkard; his sister who, with her husband, lives with them, keeps tempting him to drink so that she may inherit the fortune. Added to all this plotting comes the husband's unwarranted jealousy and the persecution of an outside man. It is not a story that will bear analysis; but makes an interesting picture. Daniel Carson Goodwin is the author and it was produced by James Kirkwood. Some of the ablest players in the profession act in it and do fairly well. Staging and photography very fair.

THE DESERT TRIBESMAN (Thanhouser), March 3.—Very entertaining picture telling a story of Arabia that is convincing enough not only in its staging, costuming and acting, but in the flavor of the story itself, which seems almost like some bit of history retold. It has been artistically done and is full of little things that please, but the early part of the story in which the baby son of the old calif is smuggled out of the palace and saved from the hands of the ursurper seems more likely as presented than the coming back of the man full grown to claim his own; yet that fight in the palace is distinctly good and full of life. This picture ought to be popular everywhere. The photography is excellent.

THE PATH OF GENIUS (Kay-Bee), March 6.—A romantic story with an artist as its hero. There is true art in the picture and one very excellent thing in it is the consistent early Georgian atmosphere all through it. The thatch on the houses, the tap room and kitchen of the inn are perfect in their old English suggestions. People will surely like this two-reel offering. Some lonely pictures and a couple of perfect landscapes with fine cloud effects are included.

DESERT GOLD (Kay-Bee), March 13.—There's a group of scenes in this picture remarkable for its fresh and somewhat weird atmosphere. A man finds a skeleton with an arrow between its ribs and then sees a cabin and finds a treasure in it. To keep it all to himself he dastardly betrays his partner, perhaps to die in the desert—the man had married the girl he loved—but he is saved by some passing settlers and in time inherits the gold from his betrayer, whom he finds dead in the parched sands. It is a picture that will interest. Camera work good.

THE RELIC (Broncho), March 25.—An artistic picture with a pathetic story of an old actor's declining years. He has fallen upon hard times after a long and brilliant career and is reduced to such straits that he accepts a supernumerary's role in a production of King Lear. Luck favors him and he gets a chance to play the great leading role in which his acting is such that it crowns him with a flash of glory and then he dies. It is a picture that surely reflects great credit on its producer. The tempest scene of the play that is given so that we see it as half with the audience and half with the people behind, is deeply effective. It is the kind of offering that makes the spectator respect motion pictures. Camera work is perfect.

Centaur's New Building Well Equipped

The Laboratory and Studio in Bayonne Hold All Facilities for Commercial and Dramatic Work.

THE new studio of the Centaur Film Company is now in full swing. Under the guidance of Roland E. Blaisdell, the treasurer of the company, a party of scribes left the New York office of the company on the fourth floor of the Mecca Building one day recently to look over the glass-roofed structure at Avenue E and East Forty-third Street, Bayonne. They found a completely equipped studio 75 by 100 feet in dimensions. Charles Simone, secretary and general manager of the company, and Charles Randall, superintendent of laboratory, showed the visitors over the plant. In the basement, which has an abundance of natural light, there is a large vault for the storing of raw stock. In the printing-room there are six Horsley printers in operation and another in process of construction. Here also are rooms for perforating and winding, negative and positive developing rooms, and the section for washing and tinting and toning films. Two ten-foot drying drums are in operation, and there is abundant room for many more. To facilitate the drying process, there are large fans and blowers. Two large filters guarantee clear water for the laboratory work. A vacuum cleaner insures freedom from accumulated dust. Two good-sized boilers provide ample heating facilities.

The office of the general manager is on the first floor, at the corner of the building. Ranging along the front of this floor are the assembling benches, where provision is made for a dozen operators. On the side are work benches. The ground floor, by the way, is well above the street, so as to avoid the scrutiny of pedestrians of inquiring minds—and the multitude is always interested in anything pertaining to the making of motion pictures. A vault for the storing of negative is 10 by 10 by 15 feet. There is a large projection room, equipped with a new Power No. 6A. In the same room are two Horsley film polishing machines, which clean the film at approximately the same rate of speed as the fabric is run through the regulation projector. On the main floor also is a well-equipped machine shop. Four entrances furnish adequate accommodations for shipping and other purposes. A large area is devoted to the property room, in which carpenters are actively at work. Off of this room is another vault, with which, by the way, the studio seems unusually well provided.

On the upper floor is the studio proper. The building is so laid out that practically the entire 100 feet of space can be turned into one setting. The scene dock at the front is the only work that shortens this distance. The uprights that divide the twin glass roofs will be surrounded with foliage to represent trees. There are two offices for the producer, two dressing-rooms for the stars and others for the less exalted players. The steam radiators are on the wall, well above the floor, and extend all around the great room. The same system of elevated radiators extends throughout the building. There will be ample heat for the players and employees in any weather. A piano is one of the noticeable pieces of furniture on this floor—plainly, it is intended to develop in the players the proper mood in which to approach "big situations." For, if one may judge by the evidences of elaborate sets, there are going to be some real doings in the way of productions at this studio. In fact, it is said that work will begin in a few weeks.

The Centaur Company has been doing commercial work for some months. While a large amount of miscellaneous work is now being turned out, there is abundant space for a great expansion of facilities as growing business may warrant. General Manager Simone says that every foot of film is inspected and carefully projected for further examination before it is permitted to leave the factory.

Mr. Simone invited his guests to accompany him to luncheon at the establishment of Mine Host Garibotto. In the course of a conversation, Mr. Garibotto let drop a remark which aroused the interest of his hearers. On the way to the hotel there had been pointed out to the party a little building now sheltering the Salvation Army, which was described as the first studio of the Centaur Company—the birthplace of the independent film movement in the United States. Reference to this structure naturally brought out the name of David Horsley, the owner of the big building the party had just been inspecting. "You know Dave Horsley and I are old neighbors—we have been acquainted a great many years," said Mine Host retrospectively. "I recall one occasion when I had a chance to go into the film business with him for $250."

"Your old-time neighbor hasn't made any proposition like that to you recently, has he?" inquired one of the party.

"No; I can't say that he has," replied Mr. Garibotto, a bit ruefully. Then town and neighborhood pride came to the surface. "Yes," he added, "Dave has done pretty well; and I am mighty glad to see it."

STELLAR PHOTOPLAYERS HOME.

Frank Carroll, president of the Stellar Photoplayers' Company, and William Robert Daly, producer of the same organization, are back in New York with the members of their company. Mr. Carroll reports that while in St. Augustine, Fla., there were taken the exterior scenes for a forthcoming subject, which, from present indications, will be an O. K. picture. The interiors are now being made at the Ruby Twinplex Studio.

"Through Fire to Fortune."

Expensive "Sensations" Make a Lubin Five-Reel Melodrama of the Pennsylvania Coal Fields Noteworthy.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE author of the scenario, Clay M. Greene, from which this picture, "Through Fire to Fortune, or the Sunken Village," was made, has provided a script that might have been produced into an artistic melodrama. As it stands, the offering furnishes a good, entertaining story with some tremendous sensations in the making of which much money seems to have been expended. It is not artistically acted and many of its scenes unnecessarily over-emphasize the melodramatic heroism and villainy of the story. But, as entertainment, the picture surely is worth the prevailing prices that the picture houses ask. The spectator will be likely to think that its producer had bought a mine under a village in order to burn the former and have it cave in under the latter. Some of the views in the burning mine are plainly studio scenes and the lighting is such that the artificiality of them is patent; but then there are views of burning timbers and especially of fierce flames bursting forth from the shaft of a real mine. The spectator won't doubt these scenes, nor will he doubt that under the village the ground really did cave in and let the buildings sink partly under ground. One of these buildings is a true brick cottage which is wrecked before our eyes, and other buildings include a country church, a grocery store and other small shanty-like houses. The effect of all this on the mind of the spectator is marked and perhaps nothing like it has been so successfully screened before. So, on account of the story and also on account of these sensational things, the picture may safely be counted a fair evening's entertainment in places where the spectators are not particularly critical.

The picture opens at the house of a rich coal mine owner, John Pearce. We are at once introduced to the man's daughter, Helen, and her fiance, the miner's secretary, Phil Blair. The second man, Tom Barrett, to be the story's hero, comes to call and it is shown that the secretary is jealous of him and very shortly we find that he has good reason to be. We are now introduced to the elder Barrett's, a wall Street plunger; to George Bowers, his partner, and to his wife, Tom's mother. And then the scene shifts to the Barrett's yacht on which the Pierces and Blair are guests and to which news is brought that the firm of Barrett has failed. The newspaper account says that the younger Barrett is criminally involved. This is put in for the sake of a later incident and the action that follows it implicitly denies it. Barrett hurries ashore to his office, where there is a scene of confusion, but the ins and outs of the failure are not brought out clearly. There is, at the end of the first reel, a touching scene between the younger Barrett and his mother, who comforts him in his chagrin over the failure. The older Barrett falls out of a window and is killed.

The second reel finds Tom Barrett and his mother in reduced circumstances and the young man is looking for work. He rescues a little girl from drowning and this is seen by Miss Pearce, who tells her father of it. The mine operator offers Tom a job, but makes him begin at the lowest rung of the ladder to test his sincerity. He is sent with a letter to Blair at the mine, who we know hates him. Tom is plainly in for a hard up-hill struggle against odds and starts his new work picking slate with the boys and living with his mother in a miner's cottage. Some fine scenes of a great coal mine give a pleasing realistic atmosphere to all of the remaining picture. Miss Pearce, with her father, visits the mining village and with Mrs. Barrett comes to see the mine. The fiancee, Phil Blair, has plainly been dropped by Miss Pearce, and we are given no special reason for it. He has become very jealous and has determined to get Tom discharged. It now appears that Bowers, Tom's father's partner, is a director of the mine. He wants vengeance for the failure of the firm of Barrett and Bowers and is going to take it out of Tom. His chance comes when Pearce trys to promote Tom and at the meeting he brings up the old newspaper rumor and persuades the other directors to discharge him in spite of the efforts of Pearce.

At this juncture the courts give to Pearce a contested claim to a mine in another locality and he sends Tom to open and operate it. The popular young manager takes many of the miners, his friends, with him and he later persuades Pearce to run the new venture on the co-operative plan, to which he and his mother both can contribute on account of a few thousand dollars that the creditors leave, after all the debts against the elder Barrett are settled. Oil is discovered in the mine and makes it very valuable, but by accident the mine is set on fire and many of the miners are entombed, but are rescued by the masked emergency squad. It will be noticed that where the squad needed their apparatus to go safely, the hero could live and breathe without difficulty. Later he is himself entombed in a fiery-looking chamber and has to wait there till rescuers break a way through the wall to him. Except the lighting, this scene is full of realism. The burning of the mine leaves the village above it without support and this caves in house by house. There are hard times in the neighborhood until next day it is discovered that the oil well, though burning, is still working and that from it the co-operative miners really are rich men.

UNIVERSAL WANTS ANOTHER NAME.

With the acquisition of Ford Sterling, Fred Balshofer and H. Pathe Lehrman, formerly connected with the New York Motion Picture Corporation, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company is looking for a name to designate the productions to be made with the new combination that is being formed with the recently acquired forces. It is proposed to organize a producing company in which Mr. Sterling will be featured under the direction of Mr. Lehrman and the management of Mr. Balshofer. Twenty-five dollars is offered for the name accepted, and all suggestions are to be sent to Fred Balshofer, care Universal Manufacturing Company, Hollywood, California, before March 20th.

PUBLICITY MEN MAKE CHANGES.

Chester Beacroft, until recently in charge of the General Film Company's publicity, has severed his connection with corporation.

S. H. "Hopp" Hadley, of the Reliance Company, has accepted a call to Fort Lee, N. J., and will popularize Solax films, shooting arrows of publicity from the top of the Palisades. George Proctor is to take "Hopp's" place with the Mutual Film Corporation. George will enjoy a taste of Reel Life.

DICK EDMONDSON COMING.

Richard S. Edmondson, President of the Film Releases of America, Inc., and proprietor of the American Film Releases of 19 Cecil Court, London, Eng., sailed for New York February 28th on the SS. Lusitania. It is reported that he is bringing with him a number of very startling subjects.

"The Better Man."

Gaumont Three-Part Subject.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IT IS the work of Mr. Manson, in the role of Paul Loisel, the president of a rubber company, that gives the chief charm to this picture. It is a story made interesting more by the art of the actors than through any great strength in the story. There are times when the dialogue seems prolonged, and we wish we could hear what the persons on the screen are saying. It is at these times that Mr. Manson carries over and sustains the interest where in the hands of a less skillful actor it would flag. He is measurably assisted by Mr. Morlas, a player with individuality, who sustains the role of the ex-soldier turned burglar, and who is given a chance to make good when he is detected by Loisel.

Loisel is president of a rubber company holding concessions in the Congo country. The board of directors has called for a statement of accounts. Loisel feels that he is responsible for the desperate financial condition of the company, which is due to a small yield from a limited number of trees. About to commit suicide, he discovers a burglar entering the room. The intruder, trapped, tells his story. An ex-soldier, he knows the rubber country. He informs Loisel that a short distance above his present property there is an abundance of rubber. Loisel compels Stevenson to sign a declaration confessing his attempted theft.

Scene from "The Better Man" (Gaumont).

Stevenson quietly puts in his pocket Loisel's suicide note. Stevenson is taken before the board of directors and given a chance to go to the rubber country, where he is successful.

On his return he meets the daughter of Loisel. The two fall in love. This unexpected outcome of the introduction of Stevenson into his employer's home upsets the plans of Loisel, who had intended another husband for his daughter. Loisel, when Ford, the man to whom the father had promised his daughter, becomes insistent for a public declaration of the engagement, demands that Stevenson cease his attentions. Upon his refusal, he flashes the confession of theft. Stevenson, with great deliberation, calls to the attention of Loisel the suicide note, the existence of which had been forgotten. Then the younger man, apparently out of gratitude to his employer for the chance he had given him, destroys the paper which placed Loisel in his power. Loisel, humbled, admits Stevenson the better man; he destroys the confession and publicly puts the hand of his daughter into that of Stevenson.

There are strong situations. One of these is of the entrance of the burglar into the home of Loisel, and the long colloquy between the two men. Another is where the two men confront each other with their incriminating papers. There are good ensembles, as, for instance, at the reception. The board of directors look their parts. The interior sets, of which, by the way, the picture is nearly all composed, are carefully, and at times elaborately designed.

"REEL LIFE" HAS NEW EDITOR.

"Reel Life," the house organ of the Mutual Film Corporation, has passed into the hands of a new editor, Philip Mindil, who has for some time been doing the publicity work for that company. Under Mr. Mindil's direction the publication has taken on the aspect of a regular trade paper and contains considerable information that will be appreciated by users of the Mutual Program.

"Judith of Bethulia."

Four-Reel Biograph Feature Released by the General Film Company.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A FASCINATING work of high artistry, "Judith of Bethulia," will not only rank as an achievement in this country, but will make foreign producers sit up and take notice. It has a signal and imperative message, and the technique displayed throughout an infinity of detail, embracing even the delicate film tinting and toning, marks an encouraging step in the development of the new art. Ancient in story and settings, it is modern in penetrative interpretation—it is a vivid history of one phase of the time it concerns, and is redemptive as well as revelative, a lesson from one of those vital struggles that made and unmade nations as well as individuals, yet it is not without that inspiring influence that appeals powerfully to human sense of justice.

Scene from "Judith of Bethulia" (Biograph).

The entire vigorous action of the play works up to the personal sacrifice of Judith of Bethulia, a perilous chance she takes for the sake of the lives and happiness of her people. She dares expose herself to overwhelming humiliation and dishonor in a challenge of beauty to strength, struggles through a conversion of sentiment that makes the high crisis more acute, and sets at defiance the "better-death-than-dishonor" platitude, escaping both through that all-conquering combination in a woman, great physical beauty joined to lofty intelligence. She enters upon a relation of constant peril—only delicate treatment saves the situation at times—abandons her native purity of conduct and dares her own undoing, yet the noble end justifies the dangerous means and she emerges idealized by her people, an apotheosis of splendid womanhood.

Scene from "Judith of Bethulia" (Biograph).

Bethulia is a fortified town of Judea, guarding a hill pass through which an invading Assyrian army must march in order to enter Judea. In the town lives Judith, a devout young woman of lofty character and remarkable beauty, when the place is stormed by Holofernes at the head of a large army. The fighting before the gate brings into action an enormous number of soldiers on both sides, and those engines of war, such as the battering ram and catapult, which were used by the fighting male of other days under close conditions of furious combat. One desperate assault after another is repelled, scaling ladders are thrown down, great rocks are showered upon the invaders, and the wonder is that they keep at it. The reason is that Holofernes has a way of torturing and killing unsuccessful captains. An officer had better die in the thick of battle than return with a confession of defeat. Holfernes is as merciless as nature to all who fail.

The great leader's brutality to his captains when they do not succeed in carrying the fortress by storm indicates what the inhabitants of Bethulia may expect in the event of capture and serves to intensify the clash of character later on—it adds peril to the undertaking of Judith when she resolves to sacrifice herself for her people. Holofernes, after making a horrible example of defeated captains by frightful torture, resorts to strategy. His soldiers have seized the wells from which the inhabitants of Bethulia obtained their water supply, and their leader adopts waiting tactics, diverting himself with dancing girls to break the tedium. Bethulia is on the verge of famine, and the besieged are almost ready to surrender the fortress and all Judea to the spoilers, when Judith goes forth in her finest raiment, accompanied only by her maid, enters the Assyrian camp and obtains an interview with the merciless Holofernes. Against his formidable strength, his brutal ferocity and cunning, his absolute power, are matched her fascinating personality directed by intelligence and hidden purpose. She is willing to carry "her fault on her shoulders like a coronation mantle."

The dangerous and difficult situation from this point to Judith's terrible triumph and the defeat of the invading Assyrians is pictured without loss of force or charm by extreme delicacy of treatment. Beauty is constantly asserted by almost reckless prodigality in the matter of costume, and by the appeal of delightful acting. The feminine sweetness and shyness of the lovely Judith are intensified by her advances and retreats in measuring her sex attractions against his formidable power. She is weakened at the critical moment by a sudden flame of passion and compassion aroused in her breast, but self-control returns at a thought of all that is at stake, the safety and happiness of thousands of her people, and she dares be all and do all that revolts her finer nature from a deep hatred of injustice and wrong meted out to her peace-loving kindred and friends, from a noble desire to preserve her country and the destinies of her race.

EDWIN AUGUST RETURNS TO THE COAST.

Edwin August, director and leading man of the Powers Universal brand, returned to the Pacific Coast studios of the company on February 22nd. Mr. August had been in New York three weeks, and had intended making a long stay, having already begun the production of pictures at the Coytesville studio. He completed but one picture, however, when it was suddenly decided by the officials of the company to have the director-player shift his base of operations to a point where the weather was less arctic. Mr. August came East for a change of climate. He got it—zero weather and snow a-plenty. He went back to Los Angeles feeling fit as a fiddle.

Mr. August was accompanied West by Hal August, a member of his company, who came East with him, and also by a new member of his company, Eugene Ormond. Mr. Ormond, who will play opposite Mr. August, has had a wide experience on the stage and much success. He has played as leading man with Mrs. Fiske, Ada Rehan, Mrs. Carter, Blanche Bates and others. The Powers' director is highly pleased with this acquisition to his company, and all concerned are to be congratulated.

CONOLY WITH HELEN GARDNER COMPANY.

Joe Conoly, formerly with the Helen Gardner Feature Players, but who left that concern to handle a number of special pictures, has returned to his first love, being now in charge of the sales department of The Charles V. Barker, Inc., on the sixth floor of the World's Tower Building, West 40th Street, New York.

BALSHOFER BIDS IN PHOTOPLAYERS' ALBUM.

At the ball of the Photoplayers in Los Angeles, on the night of February 14, Fred J. Balshofer, who has just organized a company for the production of comedies to be released through the Universal program, secured the autograph album. For the souvenir there was spirited bidding; Mr. Balshofer paid $500 for the book.

A Man With the Bark On.

That's Dustin Farnum—Always in Love with the Great Outdoors, the Long-Time Stage Favorite Has Fallen under the Spell of the Screen—Returns West To Star in "The Virginian."

By George Blaisdell.

HERE'S a bit of good news: Dustin Farnum has come over to our side of the house. "For keeps?" replied the actor, in answer to a question; "well, you never can be absolutely certain, but so far as I can see now I am all through with the stage and am going to give my whole energy to the motion picture."

Dustin Farnum.

It was a Saturday morning in the office of the Lasky Company. Mr. Farnum was just about to start back to the coast, from which he had arrived in New York but a half-dozen days before. He had blown in with the blizzard, bearing with him the first print of "The Squaw Man," in the success of which he was more than ordinarily concerned. The actor had a sort of mind bet on the issue: If the screen production was a "go" he would stick to pictures; if, in the opinions of those competent to judge, there should appear to be a doubt that the subject was a real picture, he was ready to return to the stage. "Just as soon as I can go and get a mighty fine saddle I own I will be on my way for our coast studio," said the actor.

The importance of this decision of Mr. Farnum — to turn his back on a branch of his profession in which he has been prominent as well as successful and to start another career in the fast expanding New Art — will not be lost on his fellow-players of the stage. While it need not be interpreted as anything even remotely resembling "the handwriting on the wall," it is bound to provide matter for serious thought. Theaters devoted to screen portrayals are multiplying rapidly — old-line houses are being converted and many handsome structures sans stage and all its historic associated accessories are being built. Theaters devoted to the spoken drama distinctly are not multiplying, rapidly or otherwise. There's nothing theoretical about the situation. It's a condition which even such a distinguished producer as David Belasco has recognized by closing "The Good Little Devil" just as its screened counterpart goes upon its tentacled way; "The Governor's Lady" and "Years of Discretion." Mr. Belasco is quoted as expressing the belief that the descending blight is but a passing phase. Mr. Belasco may follow Daniel Frohman and be producing pictures yet. We may be sure if that happy time come his reputation will suffer no deterioration.

Mr. Farnum is wise in his day and generation. He comes to the screen in a period no longer formative. In building up and perfecting public-reaching distributing agencies, keen brains have spent millions of dollars. The public has been educated to the point where it demands as it has been demonstrated it will support the best histrionic skill. Mr. Farnum brings to the screen more than this prescribed qualification. He brings a personality. Of commanding height, of generous mold, with a complexion that fills the requirements of the inexorable camera—black hair and dark eyes—yet more than these there is magnetism: the qualities that make straight appeal to man and woman—frankness, democracy, entire absence of affectation. This may be a good place to recall the fact that Mr. Farnum is best known through his work in "The Virginian," which will be the next subject produced by the Lasky Company. One of the actor's present associates said he had appeared in that play 2,800 times—which statement speaks volumes for the popularity of the man and of the subject. After this remarkable success there were several years in "The Squaw Man," and then last year he was with his brother William a co-star in "The Littlest Rebel."

Efforts to draw out Mr. Farnum in regard to stage matters as contrasted with those of the screen met with indifferent success. The player was enthusiastic over his new work, his associates, and the life in general. "Do I like picture work?" he asked. "Indeed I do. I have been an outdoor man all my life. I was born and brought up in the country and love horses. Pictures appeal to me more than does the stage, where it is study all the time. Now there is hardly a moment but what I am taking in new ideas. The work is stimulating and exhilarating. I don't think in picture work there is involved the mental strain we encounter in playing in the theater because there so many little things continually go wrong.

"In the making of 'The Squaw Man' I found so much to interest me—not the least of my entertainment was watching the Indians. Like a boy, when not otherwise engaged I just sit around and 'rubbered.' You know the line of plays in which I have worked has been of the outdoor typical American sort. I have met some fine types of westerners in the last few weeks—the real cowboys, not the fourflushers. The real thing are the most charming sort of men in the world. I have yet to hear one of them use in the presence of a lady a word that anyone on earth could take the least exception to. Their gentleness, their simplicity, is remarkable, especially where women are concerned. Then again, on the other hand, when they are by themselves there is a flow of language plentifully sprinkled with Spanish and Indian epithets that would have made Mark Twain gasp. Just take a look at the fine bunch of boys in this picture."

Mr. Farnum escorted his visitor over to a five-foot panoramic view of the coast studio with the players lined up in front. "Look at this Texan here," he said; "six feet five inches in height, and every inch a man—the real thing. Here's a champion roper and here's a champion rider," and so on down the line. There was a good word for each. If these men so appeal to the player it follows the player appeals to them—that there is established between them a bond that makes for the success of any production in which they may be engaged. Kipling said it:

> There is neither east nor west,
> Border nor breed nor birth,
> When two strong men stand face to face,
> Though they come from the ends of the earth.

"Yes, I'll say again, I like the life," continued the player, as we resumed our chairs. "Why, I get up at 6 or 6:30 o'clock in the morning, and by the time it is 8 or 9 o'clock at night I am perfectly ready to go to bed. Sleep? Like a log. As to the chances a man takes in pictures. Yes, he does. So does a man crossing Broadway, where often the taxicabs are as dangerous as anything in pictures.

"One might have thought a new organization going to the coast would have been regarded by the established companies as an intruder. Not only was there nothing of the sort, but everyone was only too willing to do for us everything a man could do. It was a case of 'Come on out and use our studios or any part of our plant you desire.' It was great. Do you know the photoplayers have got a fine home in Los Angeles? I met a lot of mighty good fellows there. Am I going to join them? Why, I am up for membership now.

"The success of 'The Squaw Man' is due to the manner in which it was made—the cleverness of direction and the way the whole thing was handled by everyone concerned. In nine weeks we have located grounds, engaged actors and built a studio, carpenter shop and scene dock. Just bear in mind we had twenty-one days of rain. I never saw such a conglomeration of weather in my life."

The conversation swung around to the particular phase of the play just completed, from which the name was taken—the intermarriage of the white and the Indian. Reference was made to the portrayal of Nat-u-Rich by Redwing, the daughter of a Ute chief. "You know," said Mr. Farnum, "the minute a man marries a squaw he is taboo. I think, though, there are extenuating circumstances—that the scenario of this play creates such a situation that no man with a heart in him can fail to forgive. Yes, Redwing was splendid in her portrayal. Let me tell you a couple of incidents that interested me. One of them goes to prove that no matter how much civilization an Indian has had there will be an adherence to tradition. Little Redwing came to me one day when we were getting near the end of the picture and told me she had a beautiful pair of horns from a long-horned Texas steer which one of her relatives had mounted and of which she would like to make me a present. Naturally surprised and perhaps pleased, I tried to tell her how much I would appreciate the gift and how extremely generous she was, when I noticed her looking at me very fixedly. 'Just say yes or no,' she said shortly. In spite of education she got right down to cases.

"When we were rehearsing the scene where the baby is taken from Nat-u-Rich to be sent back to England this pure-blooded Indian girl broke down and went into hysterics. It was pitiful. It was twenty-five minutes before we could proceed with the picture. In all my years on the stage I never saw anything like it. It was absolutely the reverse of everything we have been taught about Indians."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

Latest News from Denver.

MY FRIEND H. H. Buckwalter, of Denver, who is widely known in film circles as one of the best posted men in various departments of the business in the country, has written me an interesting letter regarding the outlook in Denver and in Colorado generally. He is just recovering from a protracted attack of malaria, which was contracted during a prolonged stay in Panama. His letter is given verbatim, as follows:

"Present indications point to considerable improvement in the picture outlook in Colorado, especially in Denver, which big town has long held the cup as the cheapest moving picture community in the country—one big, quarter-of-a-million-dollar picture theater advertising, 'The most of the best for the least,' and giving it to the extent of from eight to ten reels of new and first-run film for five cents!

"The situation in Denver has taken a decided stand for higher prices, and I believe most of the credit is due to George Kleine, whose big features have broken the ice in the former solid five-cent mania of the proprietors of the houses. Some of the Kleine productions were put on at the Princess at high prices as an experiment—and it paid. The public didn't get up on its hind legs and faint or do anything else, as predicted. The attendance at the increased rates was very satisfactory, and, as might be supposed, many new faces and society people in very liberal numbers attended and voted heartily in favor of the innovation. Then, a few days later, came the magnificent United States Theater opening, and the place was crowded to the doors with the announced schedule of five cents for children and 10 cents for adults. And—another blow that upset the ten-reels-a-day fellows—the United States ran Lubin's 'Lion and the Mouse' an entire week, and made good, even in the face of the most bitter and venomous election fight ever seen in the city. They are following it with 'The Day of Days' for two days, and 'Joan of Arc' for four days, all of which was pronounced, as well as denounced, as impossible by the five-cent managers.

"The city is also in the throes of censorship agitation, but the papers are giving little space to the affair. Some weeks ago a woman whose supposed ambition was a desire to get passes to the various houses, picture and legitimate, offered to do the censoring free of charge, and Mayor Perkins turned her loose on the shows. Her report was surprisingly free from venom, for she found nothing to complain about. Then came the Woman's Club and various feminine aggregations with committees demanding the appointment of a paid 'Amusement Inspector.' Commissioner Alexander Nisbet, from whose department the appointment would emanate, turned a clever move on the agitators. Every committee had a different woman to suggest, until it became reasonably certain that every woman who wanted the job of peering behind the scenes and into the privacy of dressing-rooms, as well as free admission to moving picture houses—every woman had her own committee. So Commissioner Nisbet decided the matter in Solomonesque fashion.

"'Ladies,' he said, 'I am perfectly willing to appoint a woman inspector of amusements. Decide on one who is acceptable to all of you, and, if she is acceptable to me, I will appoint her.' Result: They can't agree, and Denver must worry along and suffer with clean amusements and clean dances and a clean bill of health without the self-advertising which certainly would accrue to an 'inspector,' whose only qualification would be her personal desire to get a job where she could find fault or boss somebody.

"Judge Ben Lindsey returned home a few days ago and brought with him a bride. The new boss of the 'kids' judge spent several evenings carefully investigating Denver's picture houses and her enthusiasm over conditions was almost unlimited. Not a complaint of bad air, dark houses or questionable films could be found, and 'mashing' inside the theaters is almost unknown, owing to the strict rules of the various managers who long ago adopted drastic measures, which were far more successful than persuasion. So rigidly is the 'funny business' rule enforced that all the fresh girls and boys have been going to the free Sunday concerts at the Auditorium. Last Sunday afternoon thirty-five fresh youths were arrested and sent to jail for this sort of thing and next Sunday, if the annoyance continues, girls will be sent to the city bastile instead of being sent home as before.

"Denver and Colorado, it seems, will be almost as popular as Los Angeles as a motion picture manufacturing center within a few months. Several large manufacturers have been investigating conditions here for some weeks and found with much astonishment that the number of clear days and the proportion of working time in Colorado is much greater than in Los Angeles or in other places where long rainy seasons, fogs and dust storms are most serious time killers as well as expense breeders The Colorado Motion Picture Company has been working in Canon City all winter and has missed only half a dozen days since last Fall. In Denver the conditions are about as good, with probably a week of really bad weather at the beginning of winter and a week in the Spring. Between these two periods, the average working time is easily six days out of seven, and the brilliant sunshine adds very much to the quality of negatives. It is almost impossible to realize that, with the remarkably clear air of Colorado, depths of from ten to fifty miles are not at all unusual in negatives.

"It is probable that some of the manufacturers will establish developing studios in Denver and work the companies at various points out in the state, where locations ranging from Spanish and Indian 'dobe architecture to range, ranch and western scenes are easily obtained, with reasonably-priced living accommodations and prop supplies.

"I really believe negatives can be made in this section for half the expense at present on the Coast, where the prices of everything have gone up, while the atmospheric and other conditions have dropped most amazingly.

"Phil Gleichman has been in Denver several days opening an exchange to handle World's Film Corporation features, and he has already closed with the United States Theater for regular feature service and one or two other houses for occasional productions, all at advance prices. The new exchange will be in the Ideal building and in charge of Harry C. Drum, who has been handling General Film Company features, as well as being assistant manager of the regular General Film office in Denver, of which his brother, Ben Drum, is still manager. The new deal will mean very close relations and complete harmony between the two booking offices and gives the Gleichman product a standing that would have required considerable time to work up."

More About Chicago Censorship.

Chicago papers have fairly teemed with news of moving picture censorship for the past week. Owing to the mass of publicity given Major Funkhouser's personally selected censor board and to the dissatisfaction caused by their decisions, Mayor Harrison decided to select a board of ten censors for the work.

Six of the ten have already been chosen by the Mayor from names submitted by the Juvenile Protective Association, social settlements, women's clubs, and other organizations. Their names are Miss Eva Loeb, Mrs. Christine Field, Mrs. G. F. Karr, Miss Katherine A. Birmingham, Mrs. Florence B. Kirk and Samuel A. Block. Each member of the board of ten will receive an annual salary of $1,320, and each is expected to work full eight hours a day inspecting films. Major Funkhouser, of course, is in charge, and he has the power to revoke the license of any film which has been granted on the judgment of his subordinates.

Almost at the hour the selection of the six members of the board was announced, a second suit, brought to restrain the city from censoring films, was filed by the Mutual Film Corporation. The City of Chicago, Chief of Police Gleason and Second Deputy Funkhouser are defendants.

The bill alleges that film censorship is against the constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Illinois.

The bill mentions that the city has passed an ordinance restricting the exhibition of films to those that have been passed on by the censorship board, and that a fee of 50 cents is charged for every film censored.

It asserts that no films are purchased or produced by the company that are immoral, obscene, riotous, or indecent, and declares that Chief Gleason has delegated powers given to him of censorship to his deputy.

"Because of the refusal of the city to grant permits for twenty-nine original films and forty-eight duplicate films," recites the bill, "the company has been unable to furnish to film exchanges fresh films in the number demanded."

Other points made in the bill are:

"The exaction of a fee is not properly an inspection tax, and is an unnecessary one on interstate commerce."

"Censorship deprives the plaintiff of liberty without due process of law and prevents a jury trial of disputed films."

"The ordinance gives judicial powers to police."

The bill prays that the defendants be made to answer, and asks that the ordinance be declared null and void permanently.

The Mutual Film Corporation was one of the complainants in the first suit, but withdrew in order to file its own complaint. The other complainants in the first suit are the World's Film Corporation and the H. & H. Film Service Company. Attorney Harrison Musgrave, for the Mutual, explained the contentions made in the injunction suit.

"Our contention is that neither the city nor any of its officers has any right to censor a motion picture film before it has been produced. The constitution of the United States gives every person the right to speak, write, or publish on any subject, being liable only for the abuse of the privilege. We contend the films are as much publications as newspapers, and that the pictures are entitled to the same privilege as actors.

"We don't object to laws for the governing of film production. There should be laws to prohibit immoral and obscene films."

John H. S. Lee, also of counsel for the Mutual, explained the reasons for the suit and the legal contentions of his clients as follows: "The Mutual Film Corporation is willing to allow the censor great latitude in deciding what is moral and what is immoral, because no legitimate producing firm wishes to release any film which will offend any patron or class of patrons; but they must protest when the censor destroys thousands of dollars invested in films when the question of morality is not raised, when the only objection is that soldiers do not act like soldiers —do not salute when they meet.

"Major Funkhouser has no more right to censor a motion picture film than he has to censor a newspaper or magazine or to make me rehearse the speech I may be about to make and prevent my delivering such parts of it as offend his sensibilities.

"We do not want to exhibit censurable pictures, but let the law go about keeping the theater clean in a lawful manner. If a picture is shown that is unfit for exhibition, let Mr. Funkhouser arrest the offender and let the lawmakers make his punishment severe.

"The Mutual concern has been prevented from exhibiting a picture in which two men chase some hens which have escaped from the coop. Policemen, believing the men are trying to steal the chickens, chase the men and the pursued hit the policemen with the eggs.

"He says that he and other policemen are 'constituted authority' and that any picture ridiculing 'constituted authority' will not be tolerated.

"'Rebecca's Wedding Day' is condemned because Rebecca weighs 300 pounds and falls through the bottom of a cab on the way to the church. Had Rebecca been Irish or German there would have been no objection, but Mr. Funkhouser says the picture ridicules the Jewish race. Jewish citizens of high intelligence who have seen the picture see nothing but the real humor in the picture and enjoy it as they enjoy the Potash and Perlmutter stories."

An attempt will be made to have an early hearing on the suit.

The Change in the Censorship Plan.

The method of censoring moving picture films has been changed. Heretofore Major Funkhouser and a committee of women have constituted the judge and jury in all pictures and there has been no appeal from their decision. Once a reel, or a part of reel, was condemned either by the women or Major Funkhouser, the manufacturer was forced to remove the objectionable part and destroy it.

"Under the new plan the picture manufacturers may appeal from the first decision if they wish," Major Funkhouser has announced. "The manufacturers who want judgment passed on a reel or a set of reels will notify my office forty-eight hours in advance of the time set for the review and I will send one of my assistant censors to pass on the pictures.

"If the assistant reports that the reel is O. K. the pictures pass without any further review. But, if the assistant censor reports that the reel or any part of it is objectionable, I will immediately issue an order that the pictures objected to are not to be exhibited.

"In case the view of the manufacturer and my assistant clash and the former persists that the parts objected to by the assistant are proper to be shown in public, I will order a further examination. The reel will then be shown in its entirety before myself and a jury of men and women. The decision of this jury will be final."

Strange Objections to "Merchant of Venice."

The fine production of the "Merchant of Venice" by the Universal was finally permitted to pass censorship last week after some remarkable experiences.

A party of prominent citizens, of the Jewish faith, was invited by Major Funkhouser to see a private presentation of the subject in a room in the City Hall. Rabbi Abram Hirschberger after viewing it said:

"Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice,' more than any other play, more than any other book, more than any other influence in the history of the world, is responsible for the creation of a world-wide prejudice against the Jew. Therefore I strenuously object to any pictures of 'Shylock' being shown to children."

The scenes showing Shylock groveling on the ground and clutching his beloved money was especially repugnant to him. In referring to it he said:

"Such a picture is not fit to be shown to children. It must create in their young minds prejudice against our race, and that is what we are trying to put an end to."

The other members of the party could not see with the eyes of the rabbi and the passing of the films was allowed.

To Form Social Organization in Chicago.

At a dinner given in the Union restaurant Wednesday evening, February 18th, to which some of the trade press and of those connected with the film business in Chicago sat down, an informal discussion regarding the advisability of forming a social organization in this city similar to the Screen Club of New York took place.

R. R. Nehls, general manager of the American Film Mfg. Co., was elected temporary chairman, and he appointed a committee on organization.

Those present, who may act as charter members, were: W. R. Early, of the Morning Telegraph; Warren A. Patrick, of the New York Clipper; N. G. Caward, of Motography; Charles Andres, of the Billboard; Don C. Meaney, of Essanay; C. E. Nixon, of Selig; R. R. Nehls, of the American Film Mfg. Co.; John Rock, of Vitagraph; Captain A. L. A. Boening, of the American Cinematograph Co., and A. K. Greenland, of the Billboard. The committee on organization is to report on March 18th.

A similar attempt to create a Screen Club in Chicago was made about a year and a half ago, but somehow, probably through lack of interest, it died of inanition.

The Chicago Press Changes Front to Pictures.

A few months ago a dramatic critic of one of the leading dailies in Chicago remarked that he had never seen a moving picture, and he intimated that he did not care to have such an experience.

Times have changed mightily, however, within the past fortnight. The Record-Herald of Friday, February 20th, had a large display advertisement announcing that there would be a review of "The Merchant of Venice" in the following Sunday's issue of that paper by James O'Donnell Bennett, Dean of Chicago dramatic critics. This is certainly a significant change of front toward moving pictures, and it is only one incident in the remarkable revival in favor of pictures by the entire press of Chicago.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The Chicago office of the Moving Picture World will be moved from 167 West Washington Street to 917-919 Schiller Building, about March 4th.

The first release of the Hearst-Selig News Pictorial, which was announced in my last letter to be made Friday, February 27th, will be made Saturday, February 28th, and thereafter on Saturday every week. The change was made owing to the fact that the Selig Friday regular release would be interfered with by following the original announcement.

Chief of Police Gleason has instructed police officers that all large signs, posters, and other obstructions in front of moving picture theaters will not be allowed unless the owner procures a permit, signed by the Commissioner of Public Works.

Moving pictures will soon be used in the William Beye public school, Oak Park, Ill., for the instruction of pupils. The gift of a picture machine to the Parents' and Teachers' Association by Village Trustee O. C. Doering has been accepted, and teachers employed there will select appropriate pictures dealing with subjects that will enlighten the pupils.

Beginning Sunday, March 1, the Chicago Tribune will thereafter devote one page, in two colors, in its Sunday magazine, to moving pictures. The page will bear the title, "The Film and the Screen." In every issue of this page the cut of some noted photoplay actor or actress will appear, with a biographical sketch. There will also be gossip about the photoplayers and a correspondence column for Tribune readers to express their preferences for people who figure prominently in photodramatic work. The page will be syndicated weekly throughout the country, fifty or sixty leading newspapers being on the list.

OHIO FEATURE MAN IN NEW YORK.

Charles Zettler, of the Edwards-Zettler Feature Film Co., who has been in New York for the past week securing high-class pictures for his territory, has returned to Ohio. Mr. Zettler expresses himself as greatly pleased with the Helen Gardner productions which he has been receiving for some time, and speaks in glowing terms of "A Princess of Bagdad," a six reel feature from the above studio which has met with unparalleled success throughout Ohio.

"The Portrait."

Vit-graph, Two-Part Feature. Released Through General Film Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature is dominated by a high standard of quality. The story published in full in another part of the Moving Picture World is distinguished by its novelty and its genuine pathos. The sequence of events runs on with logical promptness and leaves us at the end with a feeling of regret at the shortness of the tale.

I have no hesitation in singling out this feature as a type of what the multiple reel of the future must and will be if it is to be a permanent part of motion picture entertainments. A strong dramatic story is told without the adventitious aid of burning bridges and runaway automobiles. There is a fine exhibition of how a capable and competent director handles an accident necessary to the plot. It had to be shown that a young artist tumbled from his bicycle and sustained some hurts. In the freak feature the accident would have been the substance and the story would have been the shadow. It was not important, as far as the plot of the story went, to show the details of the accident and therefore they were not shown. Here is a fine disdain of the circus methods of some producers and for that reason it will be doubly appreciated by all lovers of the drama on the screen.

Scene from "The Portrait" (Vitagraph).

There is strong dramatic action in this feature, swift, direct and always pertinent to the main theme of the story. It might have been spun out into three reels but the condensation gives it its "punch."

A plot dealing with the salvation of an amiable but weak character is always fascinating when the director knows his business and in this feature the director displays superb skill. A country boy with a mistaken belief in his artistic talents is saved from utter degradation and crime by the portrait of his mother. The country boy is played by James Morrison, who is as conscientious in his work as he is gifted and ambitious. Young Morrison gives a most sympathetic and lovable interpretation of the weak-willed boy slowly losing his way in the mazes of city life but rallied to his better self at the sight of the life-like portrait of his mother, which he had unwittingly come to destroy. "Rosemary Blair," the mother, was played by Mrs. Mary Maurice and it is needless to say that she endowed the character of the lovely guileless old lady with all the charm and power of her art. Skillful touches here and there discover but do not obtrude the fact that she is a Southern woman possessed of all the natural and dainty refinement which characterizes the true Southern woman of the old school. The other parts were equally well taken. Rarely has even the Vitagraph Company presented us with a finer toute ensemble. The settings of the old Southern home were simply charming in their naturalness. No less characteristic were the settings of the artist's school and studios. "The Portrait" is a nearly perfect picture and will form a most welcome item in the most ambitious motion picture entertainment.

LOOK OUT FOR STOLEN PROPERTY.

On the night of February 18, between closing time and 7 a.m. the next morning, the Parkway Theater, 1161 Jamaica Avenue, Woodhaven, Long Island, N. Y., was broken into by burglars and robbed of machinery and films as follows:

Power's 6 head, Serial No. 808.
Power's 5 head, Serial No. 5707.
Kinemacolor head, Serial No. 407.
"Wrecked in Mid-Air" (Cines—3 reels), General Film Company, No. 14,122-14,123-14,124.
"The Manicure Girl" (Edison—1 reel), General Film Company, No. 13,756.
"Quicksands" (Essanay—1 reel), General Film Company, No. 13,499.

That the thieves knew just what to take would indicate that they may have been in the motion picture business at one time. It is probable that these articles will turn up for sale at some future time. Exhibitors are requested to be on the lookout for them. It would help greatly to locate the property if exhibitors in cities where there is regular inspection would turn this list of stolen mechanisms over to the local inspector, one of whom may sooner or later get on track of the thieves. If any trace of the missing articles is found communication should be addressed to Mr. E. Mayer, manager of the Parkway Theater.

STOP THAT NOISE.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—What's all this noise from Chicago about a family of Hoffmans having 100 feet of film taken which is referred to elsewhere in this issue as "A Genealogical Family Tree"?

Kind sir, I would have you know that I have had a "Genealogical Family Tree" of my family for one year this very month, and it's not any measely 100 feet either; it's a full 250. We have been visiting our relatives by parcel post ever since and made our debut in a Chicago theater as far back as last September. We have also appeared in many other places.

While it grieves me to grab any glory from possible relatives I cannot allow anyone to put anything over on me, be they Hoffmans or no Hoffmans. While I must give the Chicago branch credit for doing their share in populating the surface of the earth, I view with alarm the apparently slim chances for the survival of our grand old Irish name.

Yours truly,

HUGH HOFFMAN.

PATHE ANNOUNCES SPECIAL COMEDY RELEASES.

Starting with March 26th, it is announced that Pathe will release, every other Wednesday, a special one reel comedy. Chief Director Gasnier and Donald MacKenzie will be the directors of these special comedies.

REMOVAL NOTICE.

R. Prieur Co., Inc., of 10 East 15th St., New York City, beg to announce their removal to larger quarters, Room 1404, 14th floor, in the World's Tower Bldg., No. 110-112 West 40th St., New York City.

FAIRMAN LEAVES MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

James F. Fairman, advertising manager of the Motion Picture News, and previously of the Exhibitors Times, severed connection with that publication March 1st. Mr. Fairman is well and favorably known in the film trade, as well as in general advertising circles. He will continue his activities in the motion picture advertising field.

"The Desert's Sting"

A Three-Part Criterion Melodrama Contains Action and Finely Photographed Views of Desert and City.

THIS is a melodramatic story of the desert. There are some finely photographed bits of scenery which stand out and materially add to the interest of the picture. Wilfred Lucas, who will be recognized as an old-time Biograph player, directs the three reels and also plays the lead.

Jeanie MacPherson in "The Desert's Sting."

Jeanie MacPherson, long time a member of the Powers Company in the Universal group, has the role of an Indian girl who tries to win a white man. Charles Inslee plays with great strength a Navajo Indian as he has played other Indians in Universal pictures.

The story is not what might be called a pleasant one. It has distinctly an unhappy ending. Then, again, in the opening we see an Indian girl singing the song of lamentation to a curio hunter with whom she has been smitten. The man is not interested, and the girl informs him that some day a member of her race will call to one of his and the white man will answer. All this, of course, was years ago—which may not add to the probability of the story. The skepticism will be aggravated when later a girl examining Indian curios in the apartments of her sweetheart, who happens to be the grandson of the earlier white man who refused to be a squaw man, has a vision of an Indian girl playing with a rattler. The grandson goes into the desert to hunt for radium, which, by the way, seems these days to be a name to conjure with and in the name of which some unusual things are done on the screen.

The grandson, Blake, is accompanied by Helen, his sweetheart, and her father. Blake is bitten by a snake. Alema, a half-breed Indian girl, in a close-up view is shown sucking the poison from his arm. She then takes Blake to her hut in the desert, where she cares for him for three days and restores him to health. Apoe, a Navajo, here enters the story and tries to induce the Indian girl to return to camp. She refuses, having fallen in love with Blake, who in turn is infatuated with Alema. Apoe poisons the pool where the two obtain their water, and Blake is made ill. The Indian girl goes to the city to find the former sweetheart, believing she can save Blake's life. Helen, on the point of marriage to a former admirer, throws aside her ring and wedding garments and goes to Blake, only to find that he has been killed by Apoe. The two women, in grief, go their respective ways.

Mr. Lucas and Miss MacPherson make the most of their parts, as does Bess Meredith in the role of Helen.

UNIVERSAL WINS "THE UNDERTOW" SUIT.

In the suit of Collier vs. Imp Films Company for the alleged infringement of the copyright of "A White Slave's Love," subsequently changed to "The Undertow," which came up for trial in the United States District Court, Tuesday, February 24th, before Judge Hough, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company won. After taking evidence Judge Hough dismissed the case abruptly with the statement that the suing party absolutely had no case on which to base a suit. The plaintiff claimed infringement because of the production of a film by the defendant entitled "The Better Way," and alleged that the damages "greatly exceeded the sum of $5,000." The plaintiff called among other important witnesses King Baggot, Imp leading man, and Julius Stern, manager of the Imp studio. This decision is important from the standpoint of the film manufacturer.

Levine Slated for London

Unassuming Young Gentleman To Be Head of Universal's European Publicity Department

By Hugh Hoffman.

LORD CHESTERFIELD, in one of his letters to his son, advised him to bear in mind that he would find his own good manners to be his best protection against the bad manners of others. What quiet gentility will gain for a man in the turmoil of business is well exemplified in the honor that has just come to Harold Z. Levine, who has been selected, from among many applicants for the position, as the one best qualified to fill the post of Universal ambassador to England and publicity promoter for that company throughout the continent.

Harold Z. Levine.

Mr. Levine, as publicity man for the Solax Company, has been well and favorably known among newspaper men for several years. He came along quietly and he goes away quietly. There is never any bluster about Harold Levine. The copy he pulls out of his pocket is always the kind of copy that editors like to get. It is noted for its substance and for the absence of "slush" and is prepared in such a way that it does not have to be written all over again. For this reason he soon became popular among editors, and this popularity was well supported by his gentlemanly bearing. These abilities and qualities are going to win him many friends among our British cousins.

As a preliminary training for his European invasion, Mr. Levine is going to California for a couple of weeks. He will spend that time at Universal City at Hollywood, where he will saturate himself with local color which he will allow to ooze out gradually in his writings when he gets to London.

Mr. Levine was nearly three years at the helm of the Solax advertising, publicity and selling departments, and resigned to accept this position. He has been looked upon as "part and parcel" of the Solax-Blache organization. He came to the Solax in 1911 and his importance in the firm has increased with its growth. In the summer of 1913 when the Blache Features, Inc., were organized at his suggestion, he was made secretary of the corporation.

During his incumbency he has contributed articles to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD on "The Feature Situation" and "Exchange Management and Assets," besides editing the Solax "Magnet," designing posters and traveling around the country drumming up business. He has often been referred to as Mr. Blache's right-hand man.

He is twenty-six years old, has a college education and a newspaper training. He is naturally quiet and reticent, but an indefatigable worker. He is going abroad with best wishes of his many friends. In talking of his new post, he said:

"I am not taking up this new work with any sense of elation, although I am sensible to the compliment of having men like Mr. Laemmle, Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Graham, Mr. Tippett and the other Universal executives backing me with such a trust. I am not elated because the new work places me in the position of the beau who has to run the gamut of inspection by his sweetheart's relatives. There's always an old maid aunt who doesn't like the way "he" combs his hair. The reason I am going over at all is because I feel I can adjust myself readily to new conditions. I am not going to try to 'teach' the English advertising men a 'thing or two'—indeed, I shall be a diligent pupil and trust my instructors will have patience with me."

ADOLPH ZUKOR LEAVES FOR LOS ANGELES.

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, left Saturday for Los Angeles, to visit the Pacific Coast studios of the Famous Players, for purposes that he has not yet disclosed, but which are whispered to be of more than ordinary importance. Accompanying Mr. Zukor were Marcus Loew, Aaron Jones, and Joseph M. Schenck, of the Loew enterprises, guests of Mr. Zukor on his trip to the coast, where they will visit the studios and watch a picture now in the course of production by Edwin S. Porter, technical director of the Famous Players.

This is Mr. Zukor's first trip away from the New York studios since his recent journey abroad.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE FLAMING DIAGRAM" (Imp).

Here is a story, a photoplay in two reels featuring the famous screen star, King Baggot, that is full of mystery, with a big question mark until the very end. It does with the knavery and the scheming in high political circles of the U. S. Government—of a foreign spy's effort to secure the formula for a new and wonderful explosive and the defeat through the cunning of a dead inventor.

Scene from "The Flaming Diagram" (Imp).

The spies manage to locate the diagram supposed to lead to the hiding place of the formula but they are unable to read it; it appears to be the foolish effusions of an unbalanced brain. Then the diagram comes back into the hands of the inventor's son, after a stirring series of scenes, and he too is unable to figure out the meaning of it. Unwittingly he allows his lighted cigarette to set fire to the diagram and then comes the clearing up of the baffling mystery.

Government secret service men and detectives know that there are spies in this country constantly at work trying to secure inner secrets of the government. It is one danger they have to constantly guard against. Some of them are caught, but one very likely hears nothing of it. This play is by a man who knows every avenue of the government service. The play is rife with suspense; the action is swift and sure, culminating in a smashing climax. It is released March 9th.

A REAL SULLIVAN PLAYS SULLIVAN.

A four-reel picture being made by the Gotham Film Company, of 145 West 45th Street, New York, is entitled "The Life of Big Tim Sullivan; or, From Newsboy to Senator." In casting about for an actor to play the part of the "Big Fellow," no less than forty candidates were rejected. It was absolutely necessary to get the late Bowery Senator's type. The forty-first man happened to be Joseph Sullivan, a kinsman of the subject of the picture. The resemblance between Joe Sullivan and Big Tim Sullivan is most striking.

The feature is now nearing completion and shows how the insignificant poorly clad little newsboy became the powerful friend of the poor in the poorest district of America's greatest city. His political career is only lightly touched upon because Tim really used his position as a means for an end; this end was to pour his dollars out with a ready hand to the hungry and the needy. The film is replete with scenes characteristic of the life of the East Side, even to the actual distribution of shoes and stockings to the human derelicts, who gather at the Sullivan headquarters to partake of the charity which Big Tim willed that his estate continue.

A striking line of paper will be released with the picture and it is expected that the feature will be placed on the market within the coming week.

INJUNCTION NEEDED?

The Thanhouser studio would like immensely to restrain the Lake Charles Daily Times, of Lake Charles, La., from printing photos of Thanhouser players under other names in "testimonial" and other ads. It seems that the portrait of Jean Darnell, of the Thanhouser players, has been used without permission to adorn a shoe ad that appeared in the publication mentioned. Justus D. Barnes, of the same company, suffered a similar indignity in the same paper. The principal complaint is that the players names were not used in connection with their portraits.

"SUPPRESSED NEWS" (Selig).

Realism that breaks into art imperishable through the columns of the daily newspaper, frequently has a red-blooded romance back of it. The young reporter, who discovers the uncertainty of affairs in the bank directed by his sweetheart's father, has it in his power to start a "run" that will shatter the solidity of the institution. He really gets his "copy" into the office despite the efforts made to restrain him; then comes to a realizing sense that he can do a better part by "killing" the news. This he does in daring fashion by impersonating the managing editor. This move saves the bank—it loses him his job, but he wins the girl. Harold Vosburgh impersonates the star reporter; while Adrienne Kroell is the banker's daughter. The well known character actor, Ralph Delmore, is the banker. Selig will release this film March 10th, 1914.

A YOUTHFUL EXCHANGE MANAGER.

Seventeen years old and the manager of a Feature Film Exchange, and a big one at that, such is Newton Thompson, who was last week installed by Charles Feature Abrams as manager of the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company, in the Flatiron Building, on Prospect and Huron Road, Cleveland. Young Thompson, who can't help being young and who will some day outgrow it, has had two years experience under the able instruction of his well experienced brother Chas. G. Thompson, manager of the Victor Film Service, of Cleveland. As a manager of the new exchange, young Thompson will not only handle Great Northern Special Features but also other features of marked merit which will be purchased from time to time for his territory.

WRONG DOPE ON "BROTHER OFFICERS."

The Apex feature, "Brother Officers," has been advertised as a three-part production. The Apex Company desires a correction of this error and a statement that the picture is in four parts instead of three.

"A GOOD LITTLE DEVIL" (Famous Players Release).

The much discussed film production of David Belasco's famous modern fairy play "A Good Little Devil," in five reels, is scheduled for release on March 1. This wonderful imaginative comedy-drama is commonly believed to be the master stroke of David Belasco's producing genius. It is presented with the entire original cast, including Mary Pickford, who, as Juliet, the little blind heroine of the play, added to her popularity as a famous film star the glory of a stage triumph, and who returns in motion pictures to the role which won this new distinction.

David Belasco Visualizing a Scene.

"A Good Little Devil," written originally by Rosemonde Gerard and Maurice Rostand and adapted by Austin Strong, is a fairy tale for young and old and all between. It might be said that it is a play for young people of all ages. It is poetry and fantasy, mingled with reality. It is a human film, echoing the cry of the world.

The motion picture camera extends opportunities that were necessarily lacking in the original production, due to the limitations of the oral stage. In the film version the fairies can be made to grow upon the spot and vanish in the air, and the soul of Charles "the good little devil," when it battles with his worse self for supremacy can be symbolized through double exposure a great deal more effectively than through the use of the different characters as in the original.

"A BURIED SECRET" (Itala).

The clue which a young detective obtains to a burglary in the house of a rich financier leads him to the discovery that the chief culprit is the mother of the girl he loves. Nevertheless, he places duty before love and through a series of, at times, baffling adventures succeeds in penetrating to the heart of the mystery. The guilty woman takes refuge on an out-going liner and when discovered on the steamship by the detective jumps overboard and is drowned. The film is replete with strong dramatic situations; the acting and photography are of the familiar Itala standard, while the ending is a happy one, the detective being united to the girl he loves.

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" A UNIVERSAL SPECIAL.

In last week's issue we referred to the Universal's "Merchant of Venice" as a Gold Seal release. This four-reel production, however, will not be a part of the regular program, but will be released as a Universal special feature, the last week in February. This screen adaptation of Shakespeare's masterpiece was produced by the Smalleys at the Universal west coast studios.

"THE CARBON COPY" (American).

Every woman knows the value of pretended indifference when playing the game of love and she also knows the peculiar attraction that a cold stern man has for a woman even though she will seldom admit the fact.

The author of "The Carbon Copy," a strong heart interest drama produced by the American Film Manufacturing Company, has woven a clever photoplay around the change of heart that takes place in a girl who enters the employ of a building contractor, solely with the idea of gaining his confidence and betraying him to her former employer.

Scene from "The Carbon Copy" (American).

The contracter, John Allen, has just had a love affair which has completelv shattered his faith in women and, in addition estranged him from his mother and sister

His state of mind is such that he is not only suspicious and wary of his new stenographer, so that she has no opportunity to accomplish her secret mission, but he is absolutely indifferent to her charms and most exacting in his demands upon her as a business woman.

With the strangeness of truth as compared with fiction, his bearing gradually proves a charm to the girl and she finally falls a victim to the peculiar influence that he unwittingly exercises over her. Her original purpose is entirely abandoned and she makes a full confession of her duplicity. The contractor recognizes the love that prompts her change of heart and she wins his everlasting regard and affection.

CRYSTAL RELEASES ANOTHER COMEDY.

The Crystal Film Company, whose films are released on the Universal Program, has discontinued the release of its Sunday one-reel drama, and has substituted in its stead a full reel comedy. This brings the Crystal's releases up to two comedies each week, one a full reel, released on Sunday, and the other a split-reel, released on Tuesday. The Crystal Company has always made comedies that have been immensely popular with the exhibitors, and they are now classed as being among the best on the market. It is to meet the steadily increasing demand of the exhibitors that another Crystal comedy is released.

The company expects to come forth with an announcement shortly with reference to new comedians that have been engaged that will surprise and please all of the trade.

KLEINE'S NEW YORK THEATER NEARLY READY.

George Kleine's magnificent new theater on 42nd Street, New York, which is to be devoted exclusively to de luxe photodrama productions, will probably be opened about April 1st. The opening attraction has not been announced, although extensive preparations are being made to have it the most elaborate and perfect photodrama production ever presented in this country. Mr. Kleine will have offices in the new building, and while abroad has been collecting some rare, costly and unique pieces of bric-a-brac and office furniture.

"IN THE GAMBLER'S WEB" (Lubin).

A very dramatic story written by Maie B. Havey, which tells of the infamous tricks of a pair of gamblers (who pose as brother and sister), to work the undoing of a worthy young business man. He is twice lured to their den and the second time is robbed of his wallet containing a large amount. The crooks dividing the spoils quarrel and the man kills his girl partner. The young business man is arrested for the murder and sentenced to a long term. His sweetheart, however, plans an escape which enables the innocent man to exonerate himself and by a clever ruse fasten the crime on the guilty one. The story is told in a beautiful two reel photoplay, with a well selected cast, including Edgar Jones, Louise Huff, Brinsley Shaw, Josephine Longworth and many others. This picture will appeal to the lovers of melodrama.

Scene from "In the Gambler's Web" (Lubin).

UNIVERSAL MELODRAMA FEATURING CHILDREN.

What director George Hall considers the heaviest melodrama ever written for the screen by him, is now in course of production at the Imp studio. The unusual feature of the play is the fact that it is being played by children all under 13 years of age, some of the leading roles being in the hands of youngsters not more than eight.

Sensationalism rules and the rapid sequence of hair breadth incidents and the unswerving suspense will make a striking release. The leading woman is Miss Inez Seabury, late of David Belasco's "Madame Butterfly Co." She is six and her work will bear comparison with that of any tragedy queen who has trod the boards. The opposite role is in the hands of "Matty" Ruppert, famed in Universal pictures.

"THE HEART OF CARITA" (Eclair).

An exciting Western story filmed by the Eclair players at their studio at Tucson, Ariz., with Jack Johnston in the lead. This Eclair production is full of action and the riding of the cowboys is a revelation in Western realism. Released Sunday, March 1st.

NEW FILM CLEANING FLUID.

A few months ago a big fire developed in a large film renting concern in Europe, occasioned by the use of alcohol in cleaning of the film.

Since this unfortunate accident happened, the "Agfa" people have been studying a new product which could substitute the alcohol or the benzine, avoiding the danger of inflammability. This product has been recently found by them and is called "Agfa" Film Cleaner.

If you should have any interest in making a trial of same, you may send your order for this to the Berlin Aniline Works, 213 Water Street, this city, who will supply you with the same.

"GRASS COUNTY GOES DRY" (Essanay).

The idea itself is a good one, and the artists have handled their role in such a way that the entire subject runs smoothly. The photography in this piece is perfect. The women folks in Grass County got together and decided that their county should go "dry" and "dry" it went. Several of the inhabitants became peeved over the fact and moved to the next county. Deacon Carpenter, however, remained in Grass County and bribed the stage driver to import some whiskey for him—but not for drinking purposes. Somebody suggested that whiskey properly mixed with a certain chemical would make hair grow on a billiard ball, and, as the Deacon was baldheaded, he had to try it. The smell of the liquor on the Deacon at the meeting in the town hall caused a furore. "Bobbie" Bolder as "Doc" Perkins, the druggist, injects a good amount of humor into the piece that will carry it well over, while Frank Owens as Deacon Carpenter will keep the audience in a continual uproar.

This production is booked for release Friday, March 13th.

Scene from "Grass County Goes Dry" (Essanay).

GENE GAUNTIER NOTES.

The large new studio for the Gene Gauntier Feature Players will soon be completed. As already printed in the World, the studio was previously a Catholic church.

Miss Gauntier, who is becoming acclimated to Northern winters, has been spending considerable time and energy in organizing her stock company. It is her intention to gather about her a galaxy of stars, so that each production will be marked by an unusual portrayal of masterful acting.

Among the recent additions to her company are W. A. Howell, who was featured with Miss Marion Leonard in the famous Rex brand, and who, besides being an excellent photoplayer, is a splendid photographic subject; Miss Marian Nichols, one of the late Lester Lonergan players in stock and well known by her work in other companies; and John Maurice Sullivan, whose work in many Broadway productions can be remembered besides being one of the well-known stock leading men in the East. Allen Farnham, the general supervisor of the studio, who has been with Miss Gauntier for the past four years and who has made four trips abroad with her players, has augmented his staff by securing some experts to aid him in preparing the scenery for some great productions planned in the near future.

It may be remembered that it was Mr. Farnham's wonderful skill that designed and made the scenery for the famous production "From the Manger to the Cross" and the charming Irish stories such as "The Colleen Bawn," "Arrah-na-Pogue" and "The Kerry Gow."

Harold Lyons has charge of the photographic end.

DANIEL V. ARTHUR COMES IN.

Motion Pictures Receive Another Recruit from the Ranks of Dramatic Producers—Ambitious Plans Announced.

Latest among the leading producers of the dramatic stage to come into the fold of the motion picture is Daniel V. Arthur, the veteran manager who has produced and piloted to success many of the important productions of recent years. It would require considerable space to recite all of the achievements of Mr. Arthur in the dramatic line; they are numerous and praiseworthy, also notable. Among the stars who have profited by his direction will be found such names as Stuart Robson, now deceased; DeWolf Hopper, very much alive, as well as Digby Bell, Marie Cahill, Henry E. Dixie and others equally notable. Productions such as "The Henrietta," "The Education of Mr. Pipp," "Sherlock Holmes" and "Robin Hood" have prospered under his guiding hand. If Mr. Arthur is able to bring to the production of pictures equal success, his name will become equally prominent in the new field of endeavor.

Mr. Arthur's first offering is an adaptation of the sensational melodrama "The Great Diamond Robbery," originally produced by the late A. M. Palmer and T. Henry French, which ran for more than a year at the American Theater, New York. In the cast of this production will be found many names already famous along Broadway. The production is in five parts and includes many exciting scenes. The cast will be headed by Wallace Eddinger, who has many successes to his credit and is considered to be one of the most promising young actors of this day. Others are Miss Gail Kane, a star of distinction; Charles J. Ross, a prime favorite in vaudeville and legitimate; Elita Proctor Otis and many others equally famous.

The firm name under which Mr. Arthur will produce pictures is the Playgoers Film Company and the release date for the "Great Diamond Robbery" is March 15th. Watch for it.

HARRY BENHAM NO VILLAIN.

YOU can't make a villain out of Harry Benham nohow. Not even in feature productions. Thanhouser actors who had had heroic and generally pleasant "leads" for years in the Thanhouser regular releases have had to appear in villainous roles in the "Big" productions—there were so many parts to be filled. James Cruze, ever cast in "nice" parts, appeared in a mean one in "Frou Frou," and William Russell, another "always" hero, did a villain in "Moths." But Benham has been exempt so far. In "Moths" he was the long suffering Correze, who in the end won the persecuted Maude Fealy. Even in "Robin Hood" they let him play handsome, carefree Alan-a-Dale and do nothing but make love, not to mention the girl again. And, luck continuing with him, he is thrust into "Frou Frou" as the gallant and triumphant Henri. Indeed, Benham is no villain in the play casts.

Harry Benham.

But who wants to be a villain—even a good villain? Handsome Harry is not to be blamed for sidestepping the "villain" parts if he can. It gets an actor nothing to be a good villain, for the better the "villain" the less is his pull with the matinee girls and the fewer are his "mash" notes. Without "mash" notes how can an actor exist? What excuse has he for asking a raise in salary?

So, whatever Handsome Harry Benham may be in real life, he is no villain in the pictures.

NEW SUPPLY HOUSE AT SYRACUSE.

W. A. V. Mack, manager of the Peerless Feature Film Company, of Syracuse, N. Y., announces that his company is about to put in a complete stock of motion picture supplies and accessories—everything the exhibitor wants. Machine parts will be a specialty. As there is no other supply house in Syracuse the Peerless expects to make a hit with exhibitors in those parts.

"HUNTING WILD GEESE" (California Moving Picture Company).

The strategies of hunting wild geese in California offers a subject for a two-reel picture which the California Motion Picture Corporation is just releasing. Nowhere in the world are geese hunted on the same large scale as in California, and nowhere have the sportsmen invented so many ingenious devices with which to lure the wild fowl within gun shot.

For the most part, however, they stay high up in the air, and, when flying lower, have a suspicious eye open for hunters. This adds zest to the hunt, and likewise interest to the pictures just released, since they show how live decoys and human goose callers attract the wary birds from their usual heights, while the hunters squat with ready triggers in hiding holes.

So cleverly are the various deceptions worked that a hunting party may kill several hundred geese a day. The pictures were filmed in the Sacramento River tule lands. Among the hunters was Arthur Payne, millionaire sportsman of the San Francisco Bay region and brother of Herbert Payne, president of the producing company.

"MYSTERY OF THE FATAL PEARL" (Gaumont).

It is not often that a film containing such distinctive features and so original as "The Mystery of the Fatal Pearl" finds its way upon the open market. This accounts for the keen interest excited in all branches of the trade by this latest release of the American Kineto Corporation.

The mere fact that the story and its treatment sustain interest even after the second showing augurs well for its ultimate success in the hands of the exhibitors. The abundance of novel advertising matter provided for its exploitation make it doubly attractive to both renter and showman. One of the six sheet posters in particular is worthy of especial mention because of its originality. It represents a four headed idol, the eyes of which follow one at any and all angles, exercising, more or less, a hypnotic influence. It is decidedly magnetic to the casual observer. The Gaumont Company predicts for this feature, unusually wide circulation; it will indeed be a small town where it will not eventually find its way and set the local movie enthusiasts guessing.

"THE BLOOD TEST" (Universal).

King Baggot, director and leading man, is just completing a two reel melodrama "The Blood Test," written by Harry Stafford, of the Eastern scenario department of the Universal. In a measure, the play is a detective story, revolving about a young inventor, played by King, falsely accused of murder. By some detective work on the part of a famous doctor, a clever ruse and the use of modern science, King is cleared in a sensational way.

Revenge is the motive of the crime, committed by a played out inventor who, after playing an important part in the scheme to rob King of a valuable invention, is thrown aside without reward. Circumstantial evidence points to King. His fiancee's uncle, a doctor, finds a clot of blood near the scene of murder and by analyzing it finds traces of a dreaded, but rare, oriental disease. Assured that King hasn't the disease, the doctor inserts an advertisement in the newspapers to the effect that he will cure, free of charge, any person afflicted with it. The real murderer turns up, is put through the third degree, and confesses. There is a delightful love story underlying the sensational developments.

PATHE STORIES IN HEARST PAPERS.

Pathe Freres have effected a combination with the Hearst newspapers which will result in wide publicity for the Pathe films. According to the terms of the agreement, the complete story of each Pathe film will be published on the day of release in the Hearst papers in Boston, New York, Atlanta, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Owing to the very large circulation of these particular newspapers which cover a field much larger than any similar organization, the value of this publicity for Pathe productions is very apparent.

ECLAIR COLORED SUBJECTS POPULAR.

Owing to the success with which "The Serpent in Eden" met, the Eclair Film Company has decided to release a series of these exquisitely colored photoplays, but this time they will be delicious comedies of refinement and legitimate humor. Letters from exhibitors came in from all parts of the country stating that "The Serpent in Eden" had caused a sensation among their patrons, and the Eclair Company will issue this series of beautifully tinted and toned comedies in stenciled colors. The first will be released on Sunday, March 8th, and is called "Birds of Passage."

McENNERY PLANS BIG THINGS.

James McEnnery, the young motion picture magnate who sold "A Message from Mars" in America, returned to New York recently from London and made important announcements concerning features he has brought here. In addition to the film of Harry Lauder and Neil Kenyon in a comedy golf match he has "Bombita," the great Spanish bullfighter, in 1,000 feet; "The Lady of Lyons," 3,500 feet; "Nobody's Child," "A Thousand Pounds Reward," and others. While in England McEnnery formed the Anchor Film Company. He also formed the James McEnnery Syndicate, a distributing company. With him from England came Thomas Savage Graham, an Englishman who had been associated with Mr. McEnnery in business for several years and is an officer in the corporation. Mr. Graham will remain here and will have charge of the New York office of the company while Mr. McEnnery is in England. Arthur Levy is also associated with Mr. McEnnery.

Notes of the Trade

WORD comes from James Kelly, of the Consolidated Film & Supply Co. in Dallas, Tex, that the company is moving into new quarters, owing to increase of business. Mr. Kelly also tells of the highly successful party given by the Motion Picture Trade Club of that city. Every man present was connected in some way with the motion picture business. Mr. Kelly was the chairman of the entertainment committee.

The Poem-O-Graph Co., of Cleveland, have landed another good scoop with the Jones, Linick & Schaefer people in Chicago to present at the Colonial Theater of that city their successful production "The Face Upon the Floor," which is the human voice talking picture, for a solid week beginning March 2. Negotiations are now pending to continue playing their entire circuit throughout the West.

Essie Fay, expert trainer of ferocious animals and owner of the $10,000 horse, "Arabia," which has been displayed to great advantage in Universal films, has been working each day for the past two months with the heard of lions, tigers and leopards at the Universal ranch in the San Fernando Valley, Calif.

Jacques Jensen, the well-known actor, writer, linguist and globe-trotter, and now one of the popular members of the Selig Polyscope Company, has written a number of classics for the silent drama, and is at present working on a problem play in which the eminent young actor, Harold Vosburgh—late of the David Belasco forces—will play the leading role.

The Knights Templar and Knights of Columbus have arranged to see the big Savoia production "The Triumph of an Emperor," "In Hoc Signo Vinces" (by this sign you will conquer), released through the offices of the World Film Corporation, before it is put on the general market.

Leo Humphrys, who has been with Ye Liberty Theater Stock Company in Oakland, has been playing leads for Mr. Anderson for the past three weeks at Niles, Cal. He will return to Oakland next week, as his long associations with the "legit" has proved too strong an attraction for him.

Mr. Sigel, of the Poem-O-Graph Co., and Mr. Crouser, the elocutionist, will be in Chicago with that attraction March 1. Mr. J. Van Crouser is the man who met with such success during the fifteen-week run in New York.

Director Al. E. Christie, of the Universal Pacific Coast Studios, is producing his third two-reel Nestor comedy, entitled "When the Girls Joined the Force."

Kinemacolor's sensational four-reel film, entitled "Sin," which had a long and successful run at the Park Theater, is now playing the Moss & Brill circuit, including the Jefferson, Hamilton and Plaza Theaters in New York City. Unlike the films which were thrown together simply for sensational effect, this is a real "tragic morality in three episodes."

Fritz Wintermeyer, of Los Angeles, has joined the Essanay Company at Niles to play juvenile leads. Mr. Wintermeyer has been with film companies in Los Angeles, among them Selig and Biograph.

A party of huntsmen, headed by Arthur Payne, the millionaire sportsman of the San Francisco Bay region, have just invaded the wilds of the northernmost end of California with a couple of motion picture cameras as adjuncts to the usual equipment of guns, cartridges and hounds. Payne expects to secure several thousand feet of animal pictures which will be released by the California Motion Picture Corporation.

A. M. Kennedy, general manager and president of the Kennedy Features, Inc., has just returned from a trip to Los Angeles, where the Kennedy Studios are located. He says everything in California is going fine, and that buyers of Kennedy Features can look forward to some big stuff in the very near future.

At the annual meeting of the Upper Montclair (N. J.) Country Club, by courtesy of the Kinemacolor Company, there were exhibited natural color films showing Vardon, Ray and other English golf experts competing for the "Globe & Tatler" Cup on the green of the Royal Liverpool Club; and the Annual Athletic Pageant and field sports of the University of Pennsylvania on Franklin Field.

"Scooped by Cupid" is the newest production of J. Farrell MacDonald, director of Victor dramas at the Universal Pacific Coast studios. J. Warren Kerrigan, who is being featured in this brand of Universal films, plays a part which is entirely new to him. It is that of a star reporter on a morning newspaper.

David Kirkland has left the Essanay Western Company. He went to Los Angeles to play in stock.

Beatrice Mable, who has been absent from Edison films for the last eight weeks because of an operation for appendicitis, has completely recovered. It was a close call as the surgeons stated that she could have lived only a few hours longer had not immediate action been taken.

The real reasons for the popularity of motion pictures are emphatically shown in the case of "A Million Bid." Only a few years ago the same story, under the name of "Agnes," was produced by Nance O'Neil and a splendid cast. It was practically a failure, simply because so much depended on dialogue and explanations. Many scenes easy to produce in pictures were impossible to present on the dramatic stage.

Augustus Carney, of "Alkali Ike" fame, who is being featured by the Universal under the character name of "Universal Ike," has invested six hundred dollars in a gold and silver embossed Mexican saddle, reputed to have been the original property of a former governor of the State of Hidalgo, Mexico.

Irving Cummings has just returned to the Pathe Studio in Jersey City from a week's tour through the Middle West, where he appeared in a number of prominent picture theaters. He had to cut his trip, which was a great success, as he was ordered South to join the Pathe Stock Company at St. Augustine, Fla.

Miss Elenor ("Peggy") Belvins, who was with the Essanay Company some months ago, is now in Arizona and was recently married to a Mr. Davis.

Charles Brabin, the Edison director, who has recently returned from abroad, is back in the harness at the studio and going strong. His first production since his return, "All For His Sake," is so thorough in its direction that he has received many a handshake as a token of congratulation.

The Rex Company, with Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber, has combined with the Nestor Company, of which Wallace Reid is director, for a Universal all-star production of a powerful psychological drama in three reels, entitled "Barter of a Soul."

Francis Carlyle, of the Pathe, was required by a scenario to be hit upon the head with a chair wielded by Charles Arling, who used more strength than he intended. The victim was knocked down and out and a little later the physician took four stitches in the injured head. The first question Mr. Carlyle asked when he came to was: "Say, will there be a re-take on that?"

NORTH WESTERN NEW YORK.

THE Empire Moving picture Theater, 1514 Main Street, Buffalo, is under the management of the C. B. Keith Amusement Co. J. Wallingford, who has charge of the house, announces that his policy is "to present weekly the biggest and best features af American and foreign manufacturers." Mr. Wallingford is one of the best known managers in the city.

George H. VerBeck has taken over the interests of William H. Stevens in the Buffalo Feature Films Corporation. Mr. VerBeck is president and F. M. Zimmerman, road man, is vice-president. Miss Clara Irwin is secretary-treasurer and Harold VerBeck is booker in place of J. Robson Stevens. Mr. VerBeck is spending a few days at Hot Springs.

Frank I. Frane is manager of the Buffalo depot of the Greater New York Film Rental Co. His headquarters are in the D. S. Morgan building. At one time Mr. Frane was in the employ of the Imperial Film Exchange of New York. He later went to Albany to open for that concern the Albany Film Exchange. He afterward was connected with the Fourth avenue branch of the General Film Company, in New York City. He gave up that position last Labor Day. His present territory covers Western New York and Northern Pennsylvania. He says several Buffalo exhibitors recently visited him and requested that he open a licensed film exchange in Buffalo.

Slotkin & Rosing, proprietors of the Plaza Theater, on William street, Buffalo, recently introduced the "country store" at their house. Many prizes were given and the attendance was heavy.

The Hopf-Star Theater, at 1219 Lovejoy street, Buffalo, opened recently. Chris Hopf is manager. The Universal service is used at this house.

Foster Moore, Buffalo manager of the George Kleine attractions, recently made some appointments. He has chosen Charles N. Johnston as traveling representative. Mr. Johnston will cover this end of New York State as far as the Schenectady, Troy and Binghamton line. J. K. Roberts takes the place of W. E. Cornwell as manager of "Quo Vadis?" E. C. Winegar is manager of "Antony and Cleopatra," and F. M. Lapp has charge of the "Last Days of Pompeii." Mr. Moore has enlarged his quarters in Ellicott Square. The demand for "Quo Vadis?" at the Park Theater, Silver Creek, was so heavy recently that the management, which also has the Star Theater in the same town, promptly wired to Mr. Moore for another set of the pictures for the Star. Both theaters showed the production simultaneously to crowded houses for several evenings.

F. W. Young has succeeded M. F. Beier as manager of the offices of the World Special Films Corporation, 503 White Building, Buffalo. Mr. Beier succeeds Jules Bernstein in the New York offices of the concern, which henceforth will be known as the World Film Corporation. Mr. Young has been in the theatrical business for years. At one time he owned his own shows and later was interested in the manufacture of films. His territory covers as far as Albany and Troy.

E. Meadows, in charge of the General Film Company's special feature department in Buffalo, has aroused considerable interest here in the production, "Germinal; or, the Toil of Labor." A private exhibition of "Judith of Bethulia," a four-part Biograph production, will be given to Buffalo clergymen, exhibitors and press representatives.

At the Strand Theater, Buffalo, recently the writer attended a private exhibition of the five-reel Lubin masterpiece, "The Sunken Village; or, Through Fire to Fortune." The picture was enthusiastically received. Harold Edel, manager of the Strand Theater, has been offering as a special feature "The Lion and the Mouse," the six-part visualization of Charles Klein's play by the Lubin Company. The attendance at this production has been even greater than that at "The Third Degree," a five-part Lubin production of a Charles Klein play, shown recently at the same house. In the face of keen competition, Mr. Edel has also arranged for a showing of Rustin Farnum in "The Squaw Man," a six-reel production of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, and Tully Marshall in "Paid in Full," in five reels by the All Star Feature Film Company. Mr. Edel has added two more pieces to his orchestra, which now totals twelve men.

Maurice E. Ravintzky, better known to the moving picture men of Buffalo and Western New York as "Morey," has just been promoted to the position of assistant to J. A. Schuchert, manager of the local branch of the General Film Company. "Morey" has been connected with the local offices for four years. He began as an errand boy, and under Mr. Schuchert's guidance advance to his present responsible position. When Mr. Schuchert is called out of town in the interests of the Buffalo branch, he leaves the local headquarters in charge of "Morey," who is still in his early twenties. The marked success of this branch can be attributed in a considerable measure to the pleasing personalities and efficiency of the manager and his assistant.

A recent acquisition to the Buffalo force of the General Film Company is R. C. Reynolds. Mr. Reynolds has been in Buffalo only a short while, but numbers his friends by the score.

Mr. Peterson, of the Winter Garden Theater of Jamestown, was in Buffalo recently and reports the picture business on the upgrade in that locality. The Winter Garden has been opened about two months and has proved a welcome addition to the amusement attractions of that city.

Foster Moore, Buffalo manager of the George Kleine attractions, has sent out five hundred letters to managers of New York State moving picture theaters. In each letter is a warning for them to be on the lookout for an alleged bogus check passer who represents himself as an agent of the Universal Film Company, or the Kleine Optical Company. The stranger is between 30 and 35 years old, stands five feet nine inches in height, smooth faced and weighs about 150 pounds.

"The man claims he represents our companies," said Mr. Moore, "and is an imposter. I will give $100 reward for his capture."

Manager Carr, of Shea's Theater, Buffalo, will have as a Sunday feature, beginning March 1st, "Between Savage and Tiger," booked at the local offices of the George Kleine Attractions.

One of the most successful exhibitors in Buffalo is E. Dickman, manager of the Central Park Theater. Mr. Dickman only recently took over the management of this popular playhouse. He believes in giving his patrons only the best, which has resulted in his success.

John Bojanowski has an up-to-date moving picture theater at 1224 Sycamore Street, Buffalo. Louis L. Chojnacki, the manager, has given the writer some interesting information about the house, which, he says, seats 400. The front is of a very decorative design, illuminated by five high candlepower nitro lamps and a large electric sign. Special interest has been paid to ventilation. The system will force more than 1,800 cubic feet of fresh, warmed air into the auditorium for every seat per hour. The operating room is equipped with two Power's 6-A machines and a rectifier.

Records at City Hall, Rochester, N. Y., show that there have been issued for the ensuing year 37 licenses to operate moving picture shows in that city. One year ago there were 46 permits granted, showing a falling off of nine theaters.

Up to this time the signatures of about 12,000 citizens who want Sunday moving picture shows in Rochester have been placed on petition cards issued to sound public sentiment on the subject. When 20,000 names are at hand, they will be turned over to Mayor Edgerton of that city.

The Gordon Photoplay Company, Inc,. owners of the Gordon Moving Picture Theater, Rochester, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $200,000, fully paid in. This is a New York corporation. At the first annual meeting, held recently, these officers were elected: President, Jacob Gordon, Rochester; vice-president and secretary, Thomas S. Powers, Rochester; treasurer, Hymen Gordon, Rochester. These three, with N. H. Gordon, of Gordon Bros.' Amusement Company, Boston, Mass., and Israel Gordon, New Haven, Conn., form the board of directors. The Gordon Theater, Rochester, opened the second year recently. As a feature of anniversary week, Manager Powers showed Mary Pickford in "Hearts Adrift," the Famous Players' "tragic epic of the sea," in four reels, together with Universal and Kinemacolor subjects. The week of February 23, the Gordon ran solid on Jack Barrymore in "An American Citizen," a Famous Players' production.

The new Beekman Theater, of Dundee, N. Y., was recently opened with moving pictures. James Porter, of Canandaigua, has a three-year lease on the house.

The Crystal City Amusement Company has asked the Elmira, N. Y., City Council to refund part of the amount paid by the company for a theater license. The house was conducted for twenty-one days in January last year. The company wants to get back the license money except that part which represents the time the concern operated the theater.

A State Commissioner with power to censor all theatrical performances is proposed in a bill recently introduced in Albany by Assemblyman Golden.

Sol Bernstein and George H. Von Demark, owners of the Mozart Theater, Elmira, have leased the Lyceum Theater, Amsterdam, N. Y.

Plans for a one-story, brick moving picture theater has been filed with the Bureau of Building, Buffalo, by the Broadway Amusement Company. The house will cost $15,000.

Owners of the Lafayette Theater, Buffalo, which is being remodeled and will be called the Olympic, have announced to the local aldermanic ordinance committee that they are willing to provide two outside courts in the rear of their house. The city ordinance, however, requires eight-foot open courts on each side of a theater. The owners have issued a statement that their present plans offer plenty of satety for their patrons.

Fred Zeimer, Jr., has resigned as assistant treasurer of the Majestic Theater, Buffalo. M. M. Cornwell, treasurer, says he regrets the resignation, caused by Mr. Ziemer's ill health. D. A. Stewart has been appointed assistant. He was formerly employed at the Lyric.

A beauty contest conducted by the Majestic Theater, Buffalo, and The Buffalo Times has been completed. The winners, who are Buffalo girls, were Miss May Coyle, first prize, a piano; Miss Violet Newell, second prize, diamond ring; Miss May Hunt, third prize, gold watch.

The Motion Picture Programme Company has been organized in Buffalo, with a capital of $5,000. The directors are Albert Messersmith, Harold L. Bodamer and Y. H. Vogel.

New York State Health Commissioner Biggs, of Albany, has been asked if he would object to having the Niagara Falls theaters opened again. He said he had no objections as long as everyone admitted had a certificate of successful vaccination signed by a health officer. The theaters were closed recently during a smallpox epidemic at the Falls.

"BILLY BISON."

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

THE City Council of Sherman, Tex., has passed an ordinance making it a misdemeanor for an attache of a moving picture show to "spiel" for the performance. Provision is made, however, that announcement of a program be made once a day on each side of the square, provided the person making the announcement occupies the center of the street and such announcement on any side of the square does not take more than two minutes.

James P. Thompson has purchased a site in Tahlequah, Okla., for the construction of a new theater.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

KENTUCKY.

THE moving picture houses of Louisville have been showing to very small crowds, due to the inclemency of the weather. During the second week of February snow fell nearly every day, until the streets were in bad shape, and the people decided to stay at home instead of patronizing their favorite theaters. The film exchanges report a very fair volume of business, however, and are finding conditions in the tobacco state to be improving steadily.

The Central Film Exchange, of Louisville, has received its first model of the No. 6 Power's machine, and the Simplex is expected in a few days. Business has been very good at the Central, due to the efforts of Manager R. S. Shrader and the new road man, J. K. Robbins, who has just returned from a trip to the mountain district of Kentucky.

Manager D. Levinson, of the Novelty Theater, remarked that business has been very good, when the fact is taken into consideration that Louisville has been clothed in about six inches of snow, which is the worst which has been known here for several winters. The crowds are small, but that is to be expected.

S. E. Nestor, of the Nestor Film Company, Louisville, has returned from a trip to West Virginia, where he was called to attend the funeral of his father.

Carpenter & Johnston, the Louisville cameramen, have not had their camera in operation for about four weeks, as the weather has been so bad and so cloudy that taking pictures was practically an impossible task. Several good prospects are on the calendar, however, and the boys are very optimistic.

The opera house at Greenville, which has been dark for some time, will reopen with motion pictures under the management of A. D. Taylor & Son. A. D. Taylor has contracted for the Universal program with the Central Film Exchange, of Louisville.

L. J. Dittmar, manager of the Majestic Theater and the Arcadia dancing pavilion, both of Louisville, is very well satisfied with general business conditions, although he is "cussing" the weather man. The Arcadia, under the management of Johnson Mussellman, is doing a nice business. Mr. Mussellman is pushing things by getting cards out to the public, which read "Admit One." After once trying the dance hall they all come back. A series of fancy dress balls, snow dances, etc., have added materially to the hall's patronage.

The big six-reel photoplay, "The Lion and the Mouse," a Lubin production released through the General Film Company, was one of the reasons for the big crowds at the National Theater last week. The house is advertising "every act a reason," and the public is taking to the new theater in greater numbers every week.

President Otto Wathen, of the Colonels, as the Louisville Baseball Club was dubbed years ago, recently received a letter from Jake Northrop, one of the staff of pitchers, in which the latter informed him that he is conducting a picture show at Towanda, Pa., his home town, but that he would be in Louisville shortly to join the team.

Installation of a moving picture machine, which was presented to St. Paul's Episcopal church of Louisville, by Mrs. David C. Morton and Mrs. L. D. Morton as a memorial to Miss Susan Morton, will be made in a few days. Several films were presented with the machine.

A benefit performance for the City Salesmen's Club, of Louisville, will be given on St. Patrick's Day, March 17, at the five theaters of the Broadway Amusement Company. The proceeds realized from the benefit will go toward paying the club's indebtedness, incurred while boosting the "Made-in-Louisville Week," which was held last fall. Both afternoon and evening performances will be given, besides a number of vaudeville acts. Special souvenirs in the way of a program will be given to each visitor. The five theaters in which the performances will be held are the East Broadway Theater, West Broadway Theater, Ideal Theater, Highland Theater and Crown Theater.

The Photo Drama Company has been staging "The House of Bondage" at the Shubert Masonic Theater, of Louisville, and giving four shows daily. The play has only met with fair success so far, due chiefly to bad weather conditions.

W. J. Romans, of Lancaster, recently made a trip to Cincinnati, Ohio, to purchase equipment for his houses at Lancaster. He owns the opera house and a motion picture house.

W. W. Mitchell, manager of the Greensburg Amusement Company, of Greensburg, is fitting up a more commodious hall on the second floor of the W. F. Cantrall block, at Main and Cross streets. The new hall is 60 feet long by 22 feet wide, with front and rear windows, and will give a better distance from the screen than the old house. The stairways leading up to the room are very broad, and will allow for the passage of people both ways without interfering.

E. C. Coppock, of Campbellsville, has started the work of remodeling the old Mudley building, at Lebanon, for Rowland & Clark, who will operate a motion picture show. Mr. Clark has been conducting a show at the Alamo Theater for some time, which has been very successful.

The war between the "movie" houses and the ministers of Paducah continues merrily. The Arcade management billed its Sunday program and announced that it was prepared to operate at no profit, or free, if necessary, in order to keep faith in announcing Sunday shows. A legal battle has been threatened for several weeks between th Paducah Ministerial Association and the National Moving Picture Company, of Louisville, which is the new lessee of the Arcade Theater, if admission is charged to the theater on Sunday. The first Sunday performance was held last Sunday and no charge was made. Manager D. L. Martin has intimated his intention of charging regular prices hereafter on Sunday and giving the proceeds to charity. If he is defeated by the courts because admission is charged, he states that he will give all of the Sunday attractions free. The ministers decline to entertain any proposition if admission is charged. Manager Martin now proposes to create a charity fund in a local bank, to which the profits will be credited, and as the charitable organizations have declined the money after being advised by the ministers, he will give a free performance the first morning in every month to the poor people, and at that meeting will distribute orders to local merchants for clothing, fuel and food.

The Irvine Grocery Company, of Irvine, has bought the business of the Gaines Drug Company and leased the building for a term of years. It will carry a line of groceries, confections, and an ice cream parlor. Mr. Gaines will devote his entire time to his picture show and opera house. During his spare time he will engage in the pleasant occupation of hunting and fishing.

Manager Shrode, of the Rex Theater, of Hopkinsville, turned over the net receipts last Friday to the Tabernacle Association. The school children helped a good deal in selling tickets, to assist the manager of the Tabernacle through the theater. The children were offered three prizes for selling the greatest numbers of tickets. The prizes were a ticket good for three months at the theater, a ticket good for two months, and a ticket good for one month. The children got out and hustled and made the benefit a success.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., is entering Bowling Green with its third house. Negotiations which have been pending for some time between W. B. Taylor, of Bowling Green, and the Crescent Amusement Company have resulted in a fifteen-year lease by the latter of two business houses on Main street. Under the terms of the agreement the two buildings will be thrown into one and a new showhouse, to cost about $15,000, will be erected. The new house will have a seating capacity of 950. The two theaters already owned by the company in Bowling Green are the Elite and the Columbia.

Articles of incorporation were recently filed for the Nickelodeon Theater Company, of Henderson, which takes over the Nickelodeon Theater. The incorporators are H. J. McAvoy, E. L. McDonald, Charles Kramer, Stanley Spoehr, H. H. Behnken, Ike Loeb, David Hartfield, Alex. Mayer, Wm. L. Sisk, Clarence Feibel, and H. R. Helsby. The capital stock of the company is $12,000, of which J. Stanley Spoehr acquires $6,500 for his interest, and $5,500 is offered to the public in ten-dollar shares. The house has been earning large dividends for some time, and reports of the company indicate that it has earned 33.45 per cent. on a capital stock of $12,000. The house is to be enlarged by the addition of 100 more seats, redecorated, a new ventilating system put in, and an ornate canopy built in front of the building. The old Lyric Theater will be closed and rented, as it has not proved a paying venture.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

MISSOURI.

THE Kansas City branch of the Mutual Film Corporation has installed an outfit for the display of pictures for exhibitors prior to sending out the film.

C. E. Cook has taken charge of the World Theater, managed by G. H. Wiley, National secretary, during the latter's absence. Mr. Wiley retains his interest in the theater, and will resume active management on his return to Kansas City, provided that he does not decide to make his headquarters in New York, according to his original plans.

The Mystic Theater, at Thirty-first street and Broadway, Kansas City, has closed, leaving the field in the undisputed possession of the Merit, at the same intersection. The district is large enough to provide a rushing business for one house, but apparently not extensive enough to allow two to prosper.

H. W. Albaugh, of the Kansas City Machine & Supply Company, Kansas City, has decided to give his entire attention to the supply end of the business, and has accordingly disposed of the Yale Theater, that city, which he owned. The Yale was sold to W. R. Frederick, who was unable to make a success of it. Mr. Frederick has left Kansas City, it is said. The house will be continued by attaches.

Exchange men and exhibitors of Kansas City were not excited over the order barring films from the mails. One or two of the exchanges tested the parcel post as a method of shipping films, but found that this transportation was much slower than express, though cheaper in most cases.

The Supreme Court of Missouri will be given an opportunity to decide whether the ordinance keeping moving picture theaters out of a certain district in Kansas City is valid. The Kansas City council in 1913 passed a measure providing that the district bounded by Grand avenue and Main street, and by Tenth and Twelfth streets should be kept clear of moving picture theaters. Frank L. Newman and other exhibitors secured an injunction preventing the enforcement of the ordinance, and the city recently appealed to the Supreme Court. In the meanwhile work on Mr. Newman's theater at 1022 Main street is proceeding as rapidly as the weather will permit.

At a recent meeting Kansas City Local No. 1, M. P. E. L. of A. decided to present a formal protest against free motion pictures for Kansas City parks during the coming summer. It was pointed out that this course by the city would mean a heavy loss to exhibitors who have their entire fortunes tied up in the business. The city has not yet decided definitely in installing free pictures in the parks, and it is doubtful whether it has funds enough on hand to permit of the venture if it wished to do so. However, the local organization felt it wise to nip the plan in the bud.

Physicians of Kansas City are planning to take advantage of the animated pictures in a rather unusual manner. Cameramen will be secured to photograph operations by specialists, of whom there are several in Kansas City of national reputation. The pictures will then be displayed throughout the country in medical schools and elsewhere.

Baseball managers have always considered themselves in a class all their own when it comes to receiving free advice as to how to conduct their business. Kansas City exhibitors, however, are giving baseball generals a hard run in this respect. The numerous Parents-Teachers' associations in Kansas City are the latest to chime in with counsel. Their plan, however, has some merit to it, inasmuch as they propose to reciprocate to some extent. The forty-four associations will each appoint a committee of three women to interview owners of motion picture houses in their district with the idea of getting the latter to run special educational programs on Friday nights. Interrogations by the exhibitors revealed the fact that the associations, in turn, will endeavor to get the school children out in force on these particular nights. The proposition will be considered by the local branch of the M. P. E. L. of A. at its next meeting.

Boxes recently were installed in the Wonderland Theater, Kansas City, by Richards & Flynn, the owners of that and other houses. Each box contains a half dozen chairs, which are being used extensively by feminine devotees of the film who fancy the added privacy. The boxes are at the rear of the house and cost no more than an ordinary seat.

Practically all of the theaters in the business district of Kansas City, the admission price of which is five cents, have reduced their programs from four to three reels. It is felt that this is sufficiently large for five cents. The Tenth Street Theater, one of the few ten-cent houses in the business section, will continue to give four reels. The Twelfth Street Theater, another Standard Amusement Company house, will give four reels on Sundays, when the admission price is raised to ten cents. The same is true of the Wonderland, which also advances five cents on Saturdays and Sundays.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE yawl-rigged vessel, Iola, is being fitted up in San Francisco harbor, and will shortly sail for Lower California in command of Captain J. H. Syberg to secure moving pictures for a concession to be operated at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in 1915. M. S. Wall, a prominent writer of Seattle, Wash., will accompany the party.

The Silver Palace Theater, 729 Market Street, and the Pastime Theater, 789 Market street, are striving to stimulate trade by giving away a fully equipped Buick automobile. The machine is being shown on alternate weeks in the lobbies of these playhouses.

Marion H. Kohn, manager of the San Francisco office of Warner's Features, Inc., is now making a very successful trip through the territory south of this city. This firm was formerly located in the Grant Building, but is now settled in new quarters on Taylor street, near Eddy, in the heart of the film supply district.

Ben Michaels is opening a new moving picture house in the North Beach district of San Francisco, but has not yet named the theater. A contest is to be held and a prize will be given to the person suggesting the most appropriate name.

Thieves entered the lobby of B. Cohen's moving picture theater at Brazil and Naples streets, San Francisco, on the evening of February 8 and ruined the electric orchestrion, damaging the instrument to the extent of $1,000.

The Board of Police Commissioners of San Francisco has granted a permit to Thomas F. O'Day to show moving pictures at 160 O'Farrell street.

Turner & Dahnken have taken out a building permit for making alterations to the Globe Theater on Mission Street, between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth. About $5,000 will be expended in this work and the place will then be opened as a moving picture theater.

The Bell Amusement Company has been incorporated at San Francisco with a capital stock of $5,000 by E. Fried, T. O'Day and M. O'Brien.

The Portola Theater, Eugene Roth, manager, has just closed a very successful week's run, featuring "The Harper Mystery," a three-part Turner picture imported by A. Blinkhorn, of New York City. While the "Inside of the White Slave Traffic" film was being shown, this house opened its doors at nine o'clock in the morning, but is now back to its old schedule of eleven o'clock to eleven o'clock.

The Tivoli Theater was open on the morning of February 14 from 10 o'clock until noon, for the benefit of the Boys' Outing Farm, which is maintained during the summer months. Views of the farm were shown, together with the moving pictures of Mme. Schumann-Heinck's recent concert for school children.

During the last two weeks of March the Tivoli Theater will be devoted to grand opera, but as soon as the theatrical stars depart the moving picture will be seen again for an indefinite period.

During the week of February 15 the filmed version of Jack London's "John Barleycorn" will be shown at Grauman's Imperial Theater. This picture is expected to create a sensation as San Francisco is the home of Jack London, and many of the scenes were filmed around the bay. The attendance is expected to rival that recorded during the week when "The Sea Wolf," another of the Jack London stories, was shown in this theater.

One of the great attractions at Grauman's Imperial Theater these days is the music, notably the playing of Cliff Carney on the big pipe organ. In addition there is a large orchestra.

The leading daily newspaper of San Francisco, "The Examiner," is now devoting a large amount of space daily to stories of the pictures produced by Pathe Freres. These stories may be read in the morning and the pictures may be seen the same day, except in the case of the large productions, which are described in installments. The first subject to receive attention was the photoplay production of Zola's famous novel, "Germinal."

The California Motion Picture Corporation has secured the services of Beatriz Michelena, the California prima donna, as a star.

The California Motion Picture Corporation recently completed the taking of a number of reels of pictures illustrating life in the Lost Hills petroleum district. The process of drilling is shown as well as a number of views of gushers in action. The pictures were recently shown to a gathering of bankers and oil men in the laboratory of the local concern.

ILLINOIS.

F. W. HINES has sold the Grand Theater, at Fulton, to H. H. Cossman, of that city.

The Bell Theater, at Cuba, has been re-opened after being entirely remodeled and new ventilating apparatus installed. It is significant that with the rejuvenation of the house comes the announcement that no vaudeville will be run, indicating that the residents of the little city find good photoplays sufficient attraction.

The East Moline Theater Company, of East Moline, is only awaiting the advent of seasonable weather before erecting a new house with seating capacity of 1,000 on the site which it recently purchased on Fifteenth avenue, in that city. The building will be one story high, but later other stories may be added. It will be run at first as a motion picture theater, but it is the intention to ultimately use the building for conventions and other meetings.

Milo Phares has sold the Photoplay Theater, at Glasford, to Oscar Peterson.

The Family Theater, on Second Avenue, in Rock Island, has been leased to Norman and Omar Willits and H. B. Fricke, of Keithsburg, Ill., who have high aims, announcing a policy designed to "attract lovers of the better things in motion plays." They have purchased the interest of A. J. Leisy, of Davenport, Iowa, in the place. Redecoration, new projecting apparatus, and the installation of an orchestra and a singer followed their coming.

Carl Noren, a Rockford restaurant man, has had plans drawn by E. A. Peterson, an architect of that city, for a one-story 33 x 121 theater on Seventh street, in that city. The superstructure will admit of other stories later. The house at first will seat 550 persons, and these will be given an exclusive photoplay program if plans for leasing to a Rockford or Chicago company materialize.

Rudy B. Kiefer has sold the Quincy Theater, on Hampshire street, in Quincy, to John O'Neil, of that city, who now is conducting the house.

Newspapers published in Quincy give credit to the Moving Picture World for posting a number of business men of that city who had been invited to invest in the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation. The literature of the company, when received in Quincy, was referred to Herman E. Nelson of the Star Theater, who recalled the information published in a recent issue of the World.

Moving pictures of the "honor convicts" from the Illinois state penitentiary at Joliet, recently were made by the Industrial Moving Picture Company, of Chicago. These will be used by Warden E. M. Allen in lectures in New York and Chicago concerning the new Illinois plan of reforming the men instead of punishing them. It is notable that there was no attempt to exploit the unfortunate men. Previously Governor Dunne had issued an edict that no films be made, but the prisoners later volunteered to pose for the reels, provided they, individually, were not given undue prominence.

Before motion pictures can be used in school entertainments in Galesburg the wiring and projecting apparatus must be passed upon by the building committee of the Board of Education and an authorized electrician. This action has been taken at the suggestion of Fire Chief Peterson, of that city.

A building is being remodeled in Cullom to serve as an opera house. The chief attractions, it is announced, will be moving pictures.

The films showing the making of pianos at the Packard factory in Fort Wayne, Ind., were shown for two days at the Willard Theater, in Kewanee.

When the moving pictures which are being used by the Illinois State Pure Food Commission were shown at Carbondale the members of the Merchants' association attended the exhibition in a body.

The village board of Maywood has appointed Trustees Portman and Holden to investigate violations of the ordinance relating to the conduct or construction of theaters. The object is not interference with the operation of the houses, but Frederick O. Cloyes, who wishes to construct a new theater, called the attention of the board to the fact that an ordinance prohibits houses with seating capacity of more than 300, whereas some of the houses now running are larger. He wishes to construct a new theater on Lake street which will seat 450, but wants to ascertain his exact standing before proceeding.

W. A. Edwards has leased the Wildey Theater, in Edwardsville, from the Wildey Investment Company for two years from July 1, succeeding Harry Bloston, who has had charge of the house for the last two years. Edwards is having a new theater constructed in the Marks, Weber & Company building in Edwardsville and will operate both houses.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

PHILADELPHIA.

W. C. Karrer, who for a number of years has been connected with the States Right Feature Film Company and who has made a splendid success of the World's Special Film Corporation's features, announces that he is now engaged in the feature importing business for the Kilkar films, 1482 Broadway, New York City. E. W. Booth, well known to the local exhibitors, will have charge of the Worlds Special Company in Philadelphia.

I. S. Goodwin, manager of the Fifty-ninth Street Airdome, announces that he is already booking big film attractions for the coming season. The policy of the airdome will be three-day to week runs. Don Baros' famous Italian band and orchestra of twenty-six pieces has been engaged for the entire season.

One of the most complete grand orchestrations ever installed in a Philadelphia motion picture theater has been placed in the Germantown Theater of Walter Stuempfig. It has created quite a lot of favorable comment.

Albert H. Coggins, assistant City Solicitor of Philadelphia, in charge of the damage suits against the city resulting from accidents due to faulty paving, etc., is making arrangements with H. B. B. Motion Picture Company, of Philadelphia, to produce a series of pictures, of an educational tendency, which will be shown in the theaters of Philadelphia, as a warning to people to be careful and "watch their steps." It is also planned that whenever such an accident takes place, a photographer of the above company will be rushed to the scene, and a picture will be taken, showing just how the accident happened. This film will then be shown at the hearing, as part of the defence of the city.

M. Stiefel, one of the foremost exhibitors in Philadelphia, is making arrangements for the installation of the latest type of unit orchestration in his many theaters. It has not been definitely decided upon, but it is expected that the Wurlitzer orchestra will be used.

The Famous Players Exchange has contracted for the output of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company's productions for Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey, in addition to their Famous Players productions. They are now making bookings with the exhibitors through this territory.

The Pioneer Amusement Company, of West Orange, N. J., has been incorporated under the laws of New Jersey with a capital of $50,000. Harry S. Schultz, of Jersey City, is the principal incorporator.

The Sagamore Realty Company, of Philadelphia, has awarded a contract to A. Whitehead, Inc., for the erection of a picture theater which will be built at Germantown avenue and Graver's lane. The theater will be 33 by 86 feet and will cost $11,000.

A contract has been awarded to George Hogg, of Philadelphia, for the erection of a one-story motion picture theater, to be built at Nos. 412-414 Market street, for Day H. Powers. The building will be of brick and terra cotta, 50 by 113 feet and will cost $10,000.

Dr. William C. Jacobs, associate superintendent of schools, declared recently that the era of the moving picture as an aid to the instruction in the public schools had come. He said that at present there were not enough films made to supply the needs of every branch of study, but said that the number of subjects was increasing.

Upon the order of Judge Ralston, Magdalene Hagner and Frank K. Brang will submit to a dissolution of their partnership with John Meyers in a moving picture theater on East Girard avenue. A receiver acting for the Court will wind up the business and distribute the proceeds among the parties. Mr. Meyers complained that soon after the co-partnership was formed about a year ago Mrs. Hagner employed her husband, R. W. Hagner, as manager without the plaintiff's consent, and that the woman together with Brang, the other partner in the business, voted to increase the weekly salary of Hagner. It was estimated that the monthly profits of the business were over $1,000.

"Without equitable relief," Judge Ralston said, "Meyers is helpless. The business is managed by one partner and her husband. The plaintiff has no means of checking up the receipts of the theater."

State Fire and Factory Inspector Patterson, of Pennsylvania, has started an investigation of the moving picture theaters in western Pennsylvania. He is personally visiting every town and city in the state in order to obtain first hand information as to how the exhibitors are conducting their establishments. A new ruling is also about to be enforced which will compel every exhibitor to furnish patrons with seats, or refuse admittance into the theater until there are seats available. It is said that this rule will be rigidly enforced.

Proceedings were instituted a few days ago in the United States District Court to have Harvey Ringler and his partner, Charles E. Goddard, in the Broadway Theater, 203-205 North Broad street, adjudged involuntary bankrupts. Action was taken by the Interstate Films Company with a claim of $728.15; Lewis M. Swaab, $27.05, and the Pierce Poster Company, $2.88. It is claimed that the defendants admitted their insolvency last week. The liabilities are estimated at $10,000 and the assets at $600.

Philadelphia exhibitors are watching with interest the recent ruling of the Mayor of Pittsburgh, which provided that separate sections be made for unaccompanied men, one for unaccompanied women and one for men and women who enter the theater together. The order followed many complaints to which women and girls have been subjected while the lights are out.

J. Emanuel, of the Ridge Avenue Theater, one of the most popular of the uptown amusement houses, contributes the success of the theater to the variety of pictures shown each day. Mr. Emanuel contends that a great number of the exhibitors do not give enough attention to the selection of their pictures, and in many instances they have booked for the same day two or three heavy dramatic features, with no comedy to break the monotony of such a show. The people who are regular patrons desire something light rather than a quantity of heavy stuff.

John Holten Sikes, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., is having plans made for a moving picture theater which will be erected in that city at a cost of about $8,000. The building will be 27 by 40 feet; it will be constructed of hollow tile.

The Elkton Moving Picture Company, with offices at 118 North Warren street, Trenton, N. J., has become incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey, with a capital of $5,000. The incorporators are: S. B. Shankman, Beatrice Shankman, S. H. Lavinson and Lillian R. Laninson.

The foundry of the Birdsboro Machine Company, Birdsboro, Pa., has just turned out a large diving bell, which will be shipped to Florida, where it will be used in making pictures of submarine life. Submarine fights with sharks will be features.

J. Louis Breitinger, State Moving Picture Censor, fears that the constant inspection of films will injure his sight. While discussing Director Porter's suggestion that the segregation of unaccompanied men and women be tried in moving picture houses, he said he had been compelled to get a special pair of glasses to protect his eyes when passing judgment on the films. Mr. Breitinger thinks the plan as suggested by Director Porter to be unnecessary.

"People seldom go to the moving pictures alone," said Mr. Breitinger, "they like to enjoy the show with some friend. And besides, I don't think there is a need of this Quaker meeting custom. The dangers and liability of unpleasant experiences are very much exaggerated. Annoyances are no more apt to occur at a moving picture theater than on the street."

The Summer Amusement Company, of East Orange, N. J., has been granted a charter under the laws of that state with a capital of $5,000. The incorporators are H. H. Picking, Charles Goyer and Frank E. Ruggles.

The H. B. B. Motion Picture Company, of Philadelphia, has made arrangements to photograph the field events which will be held at the University of Pennsylvania next April, when athletes from all parts of the country, as well as a number of foreign entrants, will compete in all manner of athletic sports. This meet, which is next in size to the Olympiad, will attract visitors from all parts of the country, and it is the purpose of the H. B. B. Motion Picture Company to feature the pictures throughout the world in its work of boosting Philadelphia.

BATTY BILL

A VILLAGE SCANDAL

Moving Picture Company causes great alarm in a village, where during some early morning rehearsals, three old maids discover them, as they think, making love and acting strangely, but the joke turns on the old maids.

ON THE SAME REEL

WINKY WILLY AND THE TELEPHONE CRIME

Again Featuring the Popular Winky Willy

WINKY WILLY

Winky Willy put the whole neighborhood in consternation by raising the telephone receiver during private theatrical rehearsals when he and his mother are supposed to get killed—a fine joke on Police, Butcher, Grocer, and all. A dandy reel.

DUSTIN FARNUM

In the Best Characterization of His Career

"He played the part of 'THE SQUAW MAN' so superbly I was sorry he was not portraying an American instead of a Britisher."—Louis Reeves Harrison, in The World.

UNSOLD

MISSOURI—KANSAS—NEBRASKA—IOWA

The Voice of a few:

WM. L. SHERRY said:

"'THE SQUAW MAN' is one of the best photo productions ever offered to the exhibitor. The proof of this is the fact that an hour after the private showing, I booked ten solid weeks, and each mail brings in additional requests. Am more than pleased to add this production to my programme."

Emmet Corrigan, the brilliant dramatic star, after seeing the entire six parts of "THE SQUAW MAN," said:

"The scene in the mountains is as spiritual and uplifting as the Angelus. It is all wonderful."

Mr. DENNING, in Dramatic Mirror, said:

"Mr. Lasky, you jump into a game that many hard-working men have been studying for the past twenty years, and the very first time up, you found out a home run. 'THE SQUAW MAN' is among the few really satisfactory film adaptations of plays. For point of sustained interest, it gives place to none. It is a real story, told in photographed action; not in lengthy sub-titles."

THE VOICE OF THE CRITICS BUT AN ECHO OF OUR ADVANCE ANNOUNCEMENTS

Mr. Lesley Mason in Motion Picture News said:

"The audience leans forward involuntarily to catch every move of the personages on the screen. It is hard to say which, if any, particular scene will bring the director the most credit. The series of pictures delineating Jim's struggles across the snow-bound hills are in themselves a masterpiece, and there are many such in the two hundred and sixty-four scenes which comprise the production.

"The difference between 'THE SQUAW MAN' and 'Westerns' is the difference between Bret Harte's stories compared to five-cent 'paper backs.'

"'THE SQUAW MAN' represents the triumph of the pictures over stage productions."

Mr. Pangborn in Morning Telegraph:

"One of the great outstanding successes of feature photoplay productions has been achieved in 'THE SQUAW MAN.' Viewing the film as a whole, one is strongly tempted to say that it is perfect. From the first scene to the last, the settings, whether interior or exterior, are extraordinarily good. The photographic work is perfect, and includes many particularly fine effects. In all scenes Dustin Farnum interprets his part perfectly. The exteriors are of unusual beauty and were all made in the very country where the story is laid."

Louis Reeves Harrison in Moving Picture World:

"One of the best visualizations of the stage play ever shown on the screen, 'THE SQUAW MAN,' was a source of surprise and delight for me and to the able critic at my side. It is a lucid arrangement and delicate appreciation of dramatic values.

"To unwavering logic and consistency, to the pains taken in those tiny details which make action realistic, to the pervading sense of beauty and to highly intelligent interpretation, quickening interest in the outcome, must be ascribed the charm 'THE SQUAW MAN' is bound to exert.

"The producers have depended upon a rattling good story of adventure, running with unbroken unity sustained by a character of magnetic personality.

"Princess Redwing performs her part with exquisite fidelity.

"Dustin Farnum's unobtrusive and masterly characterization was largely responsible for the surprising delight, for he has certainly grasped the essential principles of screen interpretation, his performance is so manly and devoid of stale artifice."

New York Tribune:

"'THE SQUAW MAN' as a photo production is exceptionally well planned and executed. It gains a great deal of interest by the addition of scores of scenes—some of them 'thrillers.'

"Dustin Farnum, the star, performs with admirable dash and spirit."

N. Y. Journal of Commerce:

"'THE SQUAW MAN' is among the greatest photoplay productions ever shown. The great audience was most generous in its applause."

Jolo in Variety:

"In spite of all handicaps in not showing the picture in a regular moving picture house, 'THE SQUAW MAN' may be set down as a genuine masterpiece in moving picture productions. It is one of the best told dramas with well sustained interest excellently played by a wholly competent acting organization.

"The idea of introducing the characters is new and many of the lighting effects are a radical departure from the beaten path."

EXHIBITORS' NEWS.

NEW ENGLAND.

MASSACHUSETTS exhibitors were not so busy with legislative matters this week, as practically only one bill relating to the moving picture business in any way was heard before the present legislative session. The only bill of importance was one before the Committee on Legal Affairs relative to censorship. Corporation Counsel John A. Sullivan appeared before the committee urging a bill to vest the sole authority over all theatrical exhibitions in Boston in the hands of the Mayor. The Mayor and the Police Commissioner must now agree on the immorality of a play or picture before it can be stopped. Mr. Sullivan said that he was not highly in favor of censorship, but that if it were to be exercised at all it should be done in a more effective way, which he thought could only be practically accomplished if the matter were in the hands of one man alone. Judge J. Albert Brackett, who represents the theatrical interests, both "legitimate" and moving picture, stated he is entirely opposed to the measure, arguing it is unwise and unfair to give any one man absolute power over theaters in Boston. Judge Brackett stated clearly that the Boston theatrical business is altogether too large to be within the power of one man's judgment, and pointed out that if a Mayor should be biased in his ideas as to what constitutes an immoral play or picture, much harm might be done the theaters. No disposition was made of the matter at the hearing, but it is believed that Mr. Sullivan's stand will not find favor with the committee, which, it is expected, will leave the law in the hands of the Mayor and Police Commissioner jointly. Many moving picture men attended this hearing.

The bill relative to the censoring of motion pictures is due for another reading by the committee on mercantile affairs on the week of February 22. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts will be represented by Judge Brackett, and the various league members are very hopeful that the bill will be given "leave to withdraw." The National Board of Censorship in New York, and its decisions are now taken as perfectly satisfactory by the authorities, and this way of censoring the films should be continued, and not a plan to re-censor pictures for this State. This subject brings to mind the fact that on February 21, the Children's Welfare League of Roxbury, Mass., made public a report of an eleven weeks' investigation of the photoplay houses in that district, beginning November 24 and ending February 9. The league was among those represented at the recent hearing at the State House on House Bill 299, introduced by Senator Cox, providing for this State censorship. Out of 460 films viewed by members of this committee, 92 were found to be objectionable—according to the committee's ideas. The investigation was conducted by a committee of twenty-six members, and eight theaters were visited. The league had prepared blanks with certain questions to be answered, which were filled in by the investigators. These questions referred to the character of songs, jokes, vaudeville and photoplays, which were classified under three heads: good, fair and objectionable. The size of the audience and number of children under fourteen was also watched. In an interview with the present scribe, R. S. Thompson, secretary of the league, stated: "We confined ourselves really to two classifications, the good and fair in one group, and the objectionable in the other. Complaints brought to us last fall from several quarters were what started the investigation. We found two of the managers willing to co-operate, and one of these ran a special program for children at our request. The others were indifferent. The standards by which the pictures were judged were printed on a slip," continued Mr. Thompson, "and they are four in number and debar (1) pictures that are obscene or suggestive of immorality; (2) pictures tending to make any form of vice attractive or otherwise degrade moral standards; (3) scenes that are repulsive or offend good taste; (4) the showing of crime in such a way as to make it appear profitable. Of the 92 objectionable films, 17 per cent. violated the first standard, 20 per cent. the second, 26 per cent. the third, and 37 per cent. the fourth. There were fourteen instances of murder, five of suicide, four of marital infidelity, three of brutality, three of abduction, two of gruesome detail." Mr. Thompson named a dozen or more other points to which objections were named, but enough of them have been recorded to show how narrow and prejudiced a committee this was.

A meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts is scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, February 25. On the morning of the following Wednesday, a meeting will be held in Springfield, Mass., at which every exhibitor in Western Massachusetts who reads this notice should be present. Many members of the league in and around Boston will make the trip to Springfield, to line up as many exhibitors as possible as league members. The plan of making this trip was suggested by N. N. Brooks, an exhibitor controlling four Boston houses, and the idea was immediately considered a fine one and acted upon.

Charles Bawlet, formerly manager of the Mutual's branch office at Waterville, Me., has accepted a position as assistant manager of the World Special's Boston office, over which presides the well-known Fred B. Murphy, also a former Mutual exchange manager. Mr. Murphy has been steadily extending the business of the World Special since assuming charge of the Boston office, due to his wide acquaintance among the trade.

R. F. Keene, manager of the Empire Theater at Whitman, Mass., says that he finds business very good indeed. Mr. Keene has a first-class theater and is now using the full Universal program.

On February 19, General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, sent out letters to every theater in New England, announcing that Ford Sterling, Henry Pathe Lehrman, and Mr. Fred Bolshofer, of the Keystone comedy company, had been retained by the Universal to produce and release comedies under the Universal brand. This announcement was greeted with great enthusiasm by Universal exhibitors.

A recent incorporation is the Hanover Amusement Company, Boston, of which Frank I. Stone, William C. Craig and Samuel J. Aronson are the officers. The company has incorporated for $10,000.

Harry F. Campbell, Lee A. Rhodenziger and W. T. Howley have organized as the New England Theater Company, and incorporated for $5,000.

The Union Square Olympia Company, of Somerville, Mass., has incorporated for $5,000. A. E. Miller, Arthur E. Lord and Richard W. Drown are the promoters. Manager Drown of the Union Square has been doing a very good business since the opening of his new house. Mr. Drown is using Universal pictures.

Emery Brothers, Providence, R. I., are now breaking ground for a new theater on Mathewson Street, which will have a seating capacity of about 2,200. It is expected that the new house will be one of the most attractive and modern in Rhode Island. The builders visited New York this week to get some ideas on novel decorating and lighting effects. The house will probably be leased, when finished, to a well-known Providence exhibitor.

D. Haynes, manager of the Melrose Theater at Melrose, Mass., tells us that he has returned to the Universal camp, after a short time with the Mutual folks. Mr. Haynes uses outside attractions, but mostly picture programs.

There is a growing dissatisfaction in this section against the use of the word "Movie." Exhibitors feel that the use of this abbreviation is a slight to the art, and a most undignified way of referring to moving pictures. Practically no moving picture theater uses the word "movie," but newspapers evidently have a liking for it. There is talk now of trying to have the word discontinued as much as possible by everyone.

I. A. Rogers, manager of the Lyric Theater at Middleboro, Mass., was in Boston this week to look things over, and tells us that he has signed up for the Universal program from General Manager J. A. Eslow.

Moxley Blumenberg, president of the Maine State branch of the Exhibitors' League, is now using General Film Service and vaudeville in his big new Portland theater. Mr. Blumenberg writes that a smallpox scare has put a decided crimp in Portland theaters, as the schools were closed during the scare by the health officers, who would not allow any children admitted. To these troubles was added the unusually bad weather conditions. Mr. Blumenberg has been a very recent convert to General Film service, but knows the service well, as he used it for several years at his Casco theater, now controlled by J. W. Greely. Mr. Greely now uses Universal pictures at the Casco, and has secured it as "exclusive" service in his city, having recently switched from General to Universal.

Pastor Russell's photodrama, "Creation," is meeting with considerable success at the Boston Theater, Boston, where it is being shown on Sundays.

Manager Wilkinson, of the Opera House, Wallingford, Conn., is doing a very satisfactory business, which he attributes to the quality of his programs. Mr. Wilkinson is a firm believer in features and regularly uses the Warner's Features to excellent results.

Warner's Features are heavily advertised by the National Theater, New Bedford, Mass., of late, as this house is using the regular Warner program of three-a-week. Harry F. Campbell, treasurer and general manager of Warner's Features of Massachusetts, is doing a remarkably big business.

Harry Asher, general manager Famous Players Film Company, of New England, Boston, sent art invitations for private exhibitions of his Famous Players "Pride of Jennico," at the Dreamland Theater, Boston, on February 20 and 21. This production appealed strongly to all present as an artistic picture, and one worthy of unstinted praise.

Edward Hinkley, of West Newton, Mass., has secured a lease on the Hudson, Mass., Opera House, where he intends to run a first class theater. Mr. Hinkley has signed up for the complete Universal program from General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal at Boston.

Manager N. E. Wilkinson, of the Star Theater, Groveton, N. H., finds business up to the standard, considering the unusually bad weather. Mr. Wilkinson is a Mutual exhibitor.

Mayor Curley's decision that there shall be an absolute equality among Boston moving picture theaters as to Sunday evening opening, as was recorded in these columns, appealed to the "Post" as such a good idea, that an editorial was written to commend Mr. Curley's action. The Post said in part:

"Whatever may be the individual opinion as to the propriety of the Sunday showings of the "movies," the fair-minded must see that to permit a part of the houses to keep open while others are given no Sunday licenses is a discrimination and an injustice that a city government should not practice. All or none must be the rule."

Rudolph and Pindar, managers of the Scenic Theater, New Britian, Conn., are regular users of Warner's Features, and report a very good line of trade with these three part productions.

Judge Harvey H. Baker, of the Boston Juvenile Court, at the public conference on the "Big Brother Movement" and "Juvenile Delinquency" stated that moving picture shows, if properly supervised would help a good deal in the way of decreasing delinquency among young boys and girls Harvey Baker feels that proper moving pictures help to develop and broaden the minds of young children, but that better supervision of all photoplay theaters must be arranged for, so that it can be known where children can see clean entertainment. Mrs. Julius Andrews, who is chairman of the Juvenile court department of the Boston Council of Jewish Women declared that cheap moving picture shows and low class dance halls were the principal agencies in producing more and more Juvenile delinquency among girls.

This is the last week for the Universal "Traffic in Souls," at the Globe Theater, Boston. This production has had an unprecedented run at the Globe, and at 15 and 25 cents admission played to S. R. O. practically always.

The Crystal Theater, Meriden, Conn., reports very fair business these days, with a program of photo plays, chief of which are the Warner Features.

The Strathmore Paper Company, Mittineaque, Mass., sent letters to all New England printers urging them to see the Kalem educational feature "The Making of High Grade Papers," which shows the Strathmore mills in action.

For the first time in the history of the United States Courts, Judge Aldrich, of Concord, N. H., allowed an operator to take moving pictures during the habeas corpus proceedings, instituted by Harry K. Thaw, for the purpose of being admitted to bail, on February 20. Among those who posed for the camera at the Concord Court House were Mrs. Thaw, Mrs. Geoffrey Whitney, and former District Attorney W. T. Jerome of New York. It is understood that in granting the photographer permission to work in the courtroom, Judge Aldrich posed in his office with United States Marshall Nute. A dime-novel thriller is being made, to be called the "Man Hunt."

Louis B. Mayer, president of the American Feature Film Company, 162 Tremont Street, Boston, reports that his bookings on Jesse L. Lasky's "The Squaw Man" are very large in the New England territory.

Louis Machat, president of the Standard Feature Film Company, Boston, is greatly elated over his contract with the Midgar feature folks, by which he secures the entire Midgar production of two features each month. Mr. Machat has also bought the New England state rights for an Apex four part feature, "Through the Clouds." Mr. Machat's offices at 665 Washington Street are very busy these days.

J. A. Eslow, general manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, received a letter from W. P. Grey, of the Mystic Theater, Lewiston, Me., who journeyed to Boston to attend the Exhibitors' Ball. The letter runs thusly: "I have been thinking with a great deal of pleasure of the last few days, and of the countless things you did for me, to make my stay in Boston one to be remembered. Some wise sage once said, 'Half the pleasure in an event is the anticipation, and the other half is the retrospection.' It requires something like the past few days to drive the true meaning of such a quotation home, and when this occurs the knowledge is indeed a pleasant factor among the many things which go to make up this life. In conclusion, I can merely reiterate that I am thankful and appreciative of your kindness, and if the opportunity ever presents itself to me to reciprocate, you may rest assured I will be delighted to do so."

The Press Club, Boston, held an entertainment this week at which the display of the pictures of Scott's dash to the South Pole, was included.

Messrs. Darloff and Dutton, Pastime Theater Boothbay Harbor, Me., are using Universal service, secured from Manager Charles Stern, of the Universal's Bangor, Me., offices.

Manager Hugh O'Neill, of the Star Theatre Boston, states that Gene Gauntier scored heavily in her Warner Feature production, "Through the Fires of Temptation," when exhibited at the Star this week.

It has been rumored that the lease held by the Loew interests on the Orpheum Theater, Boston will expire shortly, and that a new corporation from New York has secured the lease of the house. This rumor, while insistent, is not vouched for.

"Shackled Souls," a Dragon feature, was used this week by Manager Felix Alland, of the Pastime Theater, Boston. Mr. Alland exploited this white slave production for a full week.

"Dances of To-day," a single-reel Universal picture, was booked by the Bowdoin Square Theater, Boston, for the week of March second. The Bowdoin Square uses General film service and features, as a general rule, but booked "Dances of To-day" as an added attraction.

JUST A YEAR AND A HALF AGO

The New York Motion Picture Corporation's output was one two-part photo-play a week

TO-DAY

We are releasing through the Mutual Film Corporation

FOUR BRANDS

KAY-BEE
BRONCHO
DOMINO

Making a total of nine reels a week
a growth of very close to 500 per cent

This wonderful growth can be attributed to the fact that Messrs. KESSEL & BAUMANN, the heads of the corporation, arrayed themselves with the world's greatest directors, THOS. H. INCE and MACK SENNETT, who, knowing what kind of photo-plays the public wanted, proceeded to make them.

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE CORPORATION

Longacre Building, 42d Street and Broadway, New York

INDIANA.

ALTHOUGH the cold weather usually is an inducement to moving picture patrons to flock to their favorite picture shows, at the present time in Indiana it is proving the reverse. The big snows that have swooped down upon Indianapolis and surrounding towns are now putting a crimp in the motion picture exchanges and theater owners business.

The Huntington, Ind., Press has made special arrangement with the Colonial moving picture theater to run stories in their columns from time to time, the stories to be of the films to be seen later on the Colonial screens. The first of the series is "Joan of Arc."

Large audiences are being attracted to the biblical moving pictures now being shown in Indianapolis under the auspices of the International Bible Students' Association. The title of the reel is "Creation." A talking machine explains the colored slides and motion pictures. The pictures have been indorsed by bible students throughout the country. The exhibition is free. Pastor Russell, of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, is speaking at the exhibition.

The Indianapolis News, one of the most influential of the Middle West dailies, has inaugurated a column each day to be devoted exclusively to news of moving pictures and theaters. The column will be made up of general as well as local news of the moving picture.

Edward G. Sourbier, a former sheriff in Indiana and now in the moving picture business, is opening a new theater in the heart of the business district in Indianapolis. The new picture house will have a frontage of thirty-two feet and a depth of 120 feet. The operator's booth will be fireproof. Space on either side of the lobby entrance will be utilized for store rooms. Interior color scheme green with orange lights. Shadows on the screen, usually made by exit and entrance of patrons, will be avoided by an extra slope to the floor.

Moving pictures for the high school is the latest thing in Evansville. A moving picture machine is to be installed in the school and a contract made with moving picture theater owners to rent the school all educational and scientific reels that reach the city. The pictures will be free to the students.

J. C. Mack, of the World's Film Corporation, Cincinnati, O., who recently came to Indianapolis to manage the Indianapolis office, has just sent in his resignation to headquarters. Mr. Mack will assume the management of the Peerless Film Company, of Indianapolis. Mr. Mack's successor for the World's Film Corporation office here has not yet been appointed. Mr. Mack succeeds Leon Bamberger, who leaves the Peerless Film Company.

The World's Film Corporation reports their "Joan of Arc" is in big demand and is playing to capacity business wherever shown. The corporation's special representative, Charles S. Goetz, recently was in Indianapolis looking after his firm's interests.

E. Brient, manager of the Chicago office of the Eclectic Feature Film Exchange, was in Indianapolis a few days ago looking over the moving picture field. It is rumored the exchange shortly will open an elaborate office in Indianapolis.

A new feature has been added to revival meetings in Brazil, Ind., with the introduction of a picture machine at the First Methodist Church.

"The Necklace of Rameses," an Edison three-part feature film with a big cast of notable players, is proving the attraction at Madison, Ind. The picture leads are taken by Marc McDermott and Mariam Nesbitt.

Leon J. Bamberger, one of the founders of the Peerless Film and Supply Company, of Indianapolis, and who has been secretary and general manager of that concern, has resigned his position and severed all connections with the firm. Mr. Bamberger says he is open to offers from either manufacturers or exchanges and can be reached at 2442 North Pennsylvania street, Indianapolis.

A moving picture exhibition of the Indiana-Pacific automobile tour of last year is to be given by W. S. Gilbreath, secretary of the Hoosier Motor Club. The western trip took thirty-six days. The pictures will be shown under the auspices of the business men's bible class of Indianapolis.

Pictures depicting the construction of the Panama Canal from its inception until the present time are proving a drawing card at the English Opera House, Greenfield, Ind. Lyman H. Howe is presenting the series.

The formal opening of the New Princess Theater, Argos, Ind., brought out a big crowd. The seating capacity is nearly 200. The incline of the floor is just right.

WILLIAM.

PITTSBURGH.

PITTSBURGH exhibitors are not only up against state legislation of an adverse nature to the business, but are finding in the city administration, and especially the attitude of Mayor Armstrong, a powerful opponent to the advance of the business. Only a short time after Mayor Armstrong was inaugurated he sent a message to the city council urging that ordinances be passed further limiting the local theaters. His reason for this, as contained in the message, was that "85 per cent. of the moving picture house patrons are women and children." The information concerning the motion picture business that the mayor has received from some source seems to be almost entirely as erroneous as his statement that 85 per cent. of the motion picture audiences are composed of women and children.

In a more recent statement the mayor has stated that he wants to have legislation enforced which will compel the seating of women and girls on one side of the theater and the men and boys on the other. The relegating of Pittsburgh motion picture theaters to the level occupied by primary schools and reformatories has not been appreciated by the local exhibitors who own handsome and expensive theaters and who cater only to the best class of amusement seekers in Pittsburgh. The separating of the sexes is not to apply to the so-called "legitimate" theater, but only to the motion picture house, and is ont to take in the many small vaudeville houses that are scattered throughout the city.

In view of the fact that legislation at Harrisburg, Pa., has hurt the business to a great extent and that the statements given out by Mayor Armstrong and the ordinances which he is advocating has further tended to give the critics and opponents of the motion picture business opportunities for getting in a few more knocks at the business, local exhibitors are considering a campaign of education for the purpose of combating the efforts of the detractors of their business.

For the purpose of proving that films do not explode, representatives of many of the Pittsburgh theaters gathered with members of State Commission of Labor and Industry, the Board of Fire Underwriters, the Pennsylvania Building Code Commission and the Pennsylvania State Association of the A. I. A., on the Monongahela wharf recently and held experiments with reels of film. The fire tests were thoroughly tried out and it was plainly shown that the films would not explode as was imagined by many of those who have enacted legislation seeking to prevent "explosions." Fourteen attempts to ignite a film and have the flames follow the strip of film into the metal magazine were tried without success. It was proven conclusively that a film fire cannot go from the outside into the magazine and that a fire within the magazine cannot communicate with the part of the film outside. The tests were an entire vindication of the motion picture men, who have long maintained that the motion picture houses are not the fire-traps pictured.

In the morning a meeting of the exhibitors was held in the Columbia Theater in conjunction with L. R. Palmer, of the state commission of labor and industry; James A. Stoose, and Dr. J. C. Price, of the labor department; Director of Public Safety Charles S. Hubbard, Building Inspector Samuel A. Dies; Francis Feehan, deputy factory inspector and Inspectors Patterson, Weaver and Stirling. The plans of the state department for the new building code were discussed and the motion picture men were informed that they would be consulted in the matter of possible changes.

The exhibitors then passed the following resolution: Resolved, It is the sense of this meeting that if the department of labor and industry would co-operate with the state building code commission with regard to formulating regulations for the erection and equipment of places of public assemblage to the end that when the said commission's work is enacted into a law it will be in accord with the practice adopted prior to the enactment. In order to facilitate the matter it is earnestly desired that the data furnished by the said commission to said department be printed or duplicated and freely distributed to allow full discussion before adoption. Meetings of members of various bodies interested are to be called at the proper time by John Price Jackson.

The Famous Players' Film Service, Incorporated, of Pittsburgh, has been incorporated under the laws of Illinois, with a capital stock of $12,000. James B. Clark, who owns numerous theaters here, is president.

P. J. Zehnder has purchased for the Elite Amusement Company a piece of property on Troy street, North Dayton, and plans are being completed for the erection of a motion picture theater on the property.

William Wray is erecting a motion picture house at the corner of Madison avenue and North Liberty street, Mahoningtown.

The Liberty Theater, which has changed its policy from vaudeville to motion pictures has reduced its previous scale of admission charges to a straight ten-cent admission.

The downtown Cameraphone pulled big crowds when "The Day of Days," a Famous Players with Cyril Scott was exhibited, although disappointment was expressed by many patrons when the advertised lecturer did not appear for every run of the film.

The Pastime Theater, owned by Charles Watson, is being considerably improved by a new front.

MANLEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

SEVERAL hundred operators and their friends participated in the third annual dance given by the Moving Picture Operators' Union, in the Old Masonic Temple at Ninth and F streets, Northwest. The hall was gaily decorated with palms and ferns and vari-colored streamers stretched from wall to wall. Spotlight dances was the feature of the evening, and during these moonlight songs were rendered by "Slim" Kellam. The Capital City Quartet, Arthur Miskel and Joseph Gross contributed to the entertainment. Great credit for the success of the evening is given to Messrs. Bush, chairman; Ormes, Isaac and Livick, who formed the dance committee. The officers of the association are: President, B. A. Spellbring; vice-president, G. D. Murphy; secretary, A. J. Livick; financial secretary, D. L. Ormes; treasurer, E. D. Dean.

The Orpheum Theater, formerly the Academy of Music, completely renovated, redecorated and refurnished, has been opened. The side walls of the auditorium have been done in old rose and gold, the ceilings, dome and proscenium arch in light buff, trimmed with gold. The box hangings, draperies and carpets are of a rich crimson and the entire lighting system has been rearranged. New wall chandeliers of massive design have been insalled and the whole interior presents an appearance of comfort and coziness. The house is equipped with two box offices, one on Ninth and the other on D street. A ten-cent admission is to be charged to the first floor, while for the balcony the charge will be five cents. The management will cater to a white clientele only, and first class films will be shown. A large orchestra has been engaged and the theater opened with a week's showing of the "Battle of Waterloo" in five reels.

Justice Stafford, in the District Supreme Court, last week declined to set aside the lease made by Jesse R. Sherwood to Moore's American Theater Company to a building now being erected at First street and Rhode Island avenue, Northwest, but instead ordered him to complete the building and give the theater company possession by March 1. Failure to give possession on that date, the court stated, would entitle the theater company to $25 damages for each day of the delay. Sherwood wanted the lease vacated because he found that the building would cost more than was stipulated.

Among the other new theaters recently opened in this city is the Revere, at Georgia and Park avenues. Here will be shown highest class film productions of the Vitagraph, Biograph, Lubin, Kalem, Edison, Essanay, Pathe, Selig, and Pathe Weekly. Arrangements have been made for "feature" nights, when multiple reel subjects will be shown. The theater is located in the residential section and is reported to be doing well.

Horace Plympton, managing director of the Edison Film Company, accompanied by Director C. J. Brabin, visited this city for the purpose of making preparations for the staging of "The Impersonator," a scenario with Washington for a setting. The scenes include the Capitol, the Congressional Library, the Washington Monument, Mount Vernon and the home of our first President, and various other scenes known nationally. Members of the Edison cast who came here to participate in the scenario were guests of Mr. Plympton at a dinner at the Powhattan Hotel.

That great possibilities exist in the moving picture field is evidenced by the fact that several of the "legitimate" theaters are being utilized on Sundays and on those days when there are no matinees scheduled for photoplays. "Peace and War in Mexico," shown at the Belasco Theater by Messrs. Shubert and William A. Brady was a marked success and has been repeated. With the attention of the whole country centered in Mexico, the showing of this film at the present time can foretell naught but success. Two shows were given on Sunday, with admission at twenty-five and fifty cents. Similar prices, with seats selling in advance, are being asked for admission to the National Theater, where will be shown on Sunday, March 1, the "Good Little Devil," with Mary Pickford, starring, Ernest Truax and the original cast. "Antony and Cleopatra" at the Columbia Theater, on February 22, was another of the successes.

C. L. LINZ.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

THE motion picture operators of Springfield recently gave their first annual ball and Tuxedo at the Moose Temple. The event was attended by four hundred persons. When the sixteenth of the twenty dances was on the lights were turned out, a spotlight turned on and a shower of confetti and tissue trailers let loose from above. The success of the event was due to the following operators: George H. Hopper, Frank Palimisano, George Whiteside, Peter Brown, C. Burch, S. Palmer, Walter Bryner, Ray Wilson, Charles Wilson and John Caldwell.

Building permits have been taken out for the two new picture houses for Springfield. Harris Hickox will remodel the Vogt building, at 115 South Fifth street, at a cost of $2,500 and the Monarch Theater and Amusement Company will expend $1,000 upon its airdome at Ninth street and North Grand avenue, East.

Moving picture theaters of Springfield assisted in advertising the "Go to Church Sunday," February 22.

THE SECRET OF THE WILL Special—2 parts—March 9).—Moore learns that he and his cousin, Lane, have each inherited one-half of their uncle's fortune. According to the will, each must have a child of his own or adopt one. Moore, childless, plans to get the entire fortune. He conceals knowledge of the will from his cousin. Lane, poverty stricken, is offered $1,000 to allow Moore to adopt Dolly, his daughter. Willis, an unscrupulous lawyer, conducts the negotiations. Sarah, Lane's wife, is desperately ill. The man, believing the money will save her life, turns the child over to Moore and signs away all his rights. But the money he receives is of no avail. Sarah dies of a broken heart. Years later, Dolly becomes engaged to Gordon, a young lawyer. Willis blackmails Moore. Dolly comes upon the two in an altercation. Her suspicions are aroused.

Lane reads of his daughter in the society columns of the newspapers. Hungry for a sight of his child, he goes to the house. Through the window of the home he sees Moore pay Willis money. The plotters discover him and have him arrested as a burglar. Her sympathy aroused, Dolly has Gordon defend the man. She is ignorant of his identity. Later, Dolly finds the missing will in Moore's desk. The plotters discover her with the papers in her hand. They overpower Dolly and are about to burn the telltale documents, when the plucky girl, seizing a pistol, compels them to stay their hands. Dolly phones for the police. Moore and Willis are placed under arrest. They are taken to the police court, where Dolly tells the story to the judge. Lane, who has been brought into the room, learns that Dolly is his daughter. He springs upon Moore and would throttle him but for Dolly's intervention. Moore, threatened with prosecution, promises to make restitution.

THE MEDICINE MAN'S VENGEANCE (Special—2 parts—March 11).—Steve, falsely accused of having stolen the gold left in his care by miners, flees from the wrath of the victims. He writes a note to his sweetheart, Ellen, requesting her to meet him. Steve comes upon a Moqui funeral canoe bearing the body of White Cloud, Chief Big Elk's squaw. He finds that the woman is not dead, but in a comatose state. Steve revives her and takes her back to her people. The Moquis hail Steve as a miracle worker and make him Medicine Man. Later, when he wishes to meet Ellen, the Indians refuse to let him depart. White Cloud goes to the rendezvous and informs Ellen of Steve's predicament. Ellen returns to the settlement and persuades the miners to go to the rescue. Binfield and Wetlock, the men who stole the miner's gold, arrive at the Moqui village with their loot. They are discovered by Steve. The rescue party appears and Steve's innocence is established. The robbers are placed under arrest.

The Moqui Medicine Man, fearing Steve's hold upon the Indians, poisons him with the juice of the loco weed—a drug which causes temporary insanity. Steve loses his mind and wanders aimlessly about. He is found by White Cloud, who stops a party of miners on their way to town for machinery. She and Steve are placed in one of the wagons. They are seen by the Moqui Medicine Man, who informs Big Elk that White Cloud is eloping with Steve. Binfield and Wetlock escape. Hastening to the Indian village they urge Big Elk to attack the miners. In the battle which follows, the miners are slain. The renegades also perish. Steve, however, escapes. To punish White Cloud for her supposed unfaithfulness, Big Elk places her against a wagon and by means of poisoned arrows shot into her hands, transfixes his squaw to the wood. Steve recovers. He comes upon Big Elk gloating over the body of White Cloud. Horror-stricken, Steve sends a bullet through the murderer's heart.

HER FALLEN HERO (March 13).—Ravenously hungry, Jerry and Pete, "busted actors," hit upon a bright scheme. Pete disguises himself and attacks Gike Spearman, a boarding-house keeper. Jerry nobly goes to the rescue.

Mandy, Gike's daughter, falls in love with the hero, who is taken into the house and lionized. Mandy gives Jerry a sumptuous meal. Pete, outside, motions Jerry to pocket his share. Mandy treats her hero so well, however, that he refuses to heed Pete's appeal.

Gike tires of Jerry's presence. Summoning the other boarders, he has the actor thrown out. Jerry falls into his irate comrade's hands. Pete slams the disguise upon him. Dragging Jerry back into the house, he announces that he has captured Gike's assailant.

Mandy's ideal is shattered when Jerry's disguise is removed. Suspecting a trick, the boarders turn upon Pete, who is cramming food into his pockets, and throw him out. Then, turning to Jerry, they hand him the same dose.

LOOKING FOR A FORTUNE (March 13).—The newspapers tell Jim that Nell has inherited a fortune. Although he has never seen her, he decides she is just the girl for him. He leaves for the city.

Nell's father detests tobacco. He orders Jack, his daughter's sweetheart, from the house when he catches him smoking. Jim meets Nell and brazenly introduces himself. Admiring his nerve, the girl flirts with him.

Jack decides to play a joke on Jim. He tells the country boy that a sure way to gain the favor of Nell's father is to learn to smoke. Jim calls upon his intended father-in-law, smoking like a chimney. While the lovers stand by, Nell's father seizes a hose. Turning it upon the unfortunate Jim, he literally washes him from the house.

THE RACE FOR A MINE (March 14).—The Sunset Mining Company is in sore straits, when Porter and Morton, the heads of the concern, receive a letter written by "M. B. Parker," of Hynes' Station, offering them an option on a promising borax mine. Baxter, a real estate sharp, enters the office while the partners are in the next room. The man learns of the Parker offer and resolves to take it up himself. He dashes for the railroad station. The stenographer, however, has seen Baxter read the letter. She imparts her discovery to her employers. Fearing lest Baxter will snap up the option, Morton hastens to the station. He arrives a minute too late. Undaunted, he hires a racing automobile and races away for Hynes' Station. The real estate sharp arrives at Hynes' Station ahead of Morton. Hiring a rig, the man drives toward the Parker home. Morton is compelled to stop for gasoline, and is held up for ten minutes.

A Mexican holds up Margaret. After felling the girl, he robs her. Margaret recovers consciousness just as Baxter approaches. Fearing lest his rival catch up with him, the scoundrel leaves the girl lying in the road. Morton drives up a few minutes later and learns of the robbery. He goes in pursuit of the thief and surprises him in the act of examining the proceeds of the holdup. A desperate battle ensues. Morton throws the bandit from a cliff, injuring him mortally. Returning to Margaret the boy restores the valuables the Mexican had stolen. Margaret then learns that the delay has probably cost Morton a chance for a fortune. Morton tells her of Baxter's villainy. With a mysterious smile, Margaret requests him to drive her to the Parker home. The two find Baxter trying to enter the house. Margaret leaps from the machine. Taking a key from her pocket, she opens the door of the house, after which she announces that she is "M. B. Parker." Baffled, Baxter slinks away. A few minutes later Morton has the coveted option in his possession.

VITAGRAPH.

GINGER'S REIGN (March 9).—Ginger is the little dancer at the saloon in Canaan Camp. Gentleman Bill, a citizen of the camp, is in love with her and wants to marry her. Ginger, however, refuses him, deciding she would rather dance than work. She receives a good offer to dance at Goldfield, which she accepts. In the meantime Bill meets Nell, a sweet gentle girl, loves and marries her. Nell falls ill, and with no money to buy medicine, Bill is "up against it." He borrows money from Rawlins, an adventurer, who loves Ginger, giving a mortgage on all he owns. Ginger hearing of Bill's marriage, is piqued and her vanity wounded. In revenge she goes to Rawlins and tells him that she will marry him if he will foreclose on Bill. Finding that he must marry Ginger if he wishes to possess her, Rawlins agrees to ruin Bill. He writes to Bill that he will foreclose the mortgage. Bill becomes ill from worry. Hearing of his condition, Ginger decides to go and see Bill's wife. She comes back to camp, finds Bill sick and Nell away. Seeing Bill's baby in the cradle she picks it up. The child has a softening influence upon her and when Nell returns, Ginger is prompted by her better impulses to help the little woman and Bill. That night at the saloon she gives a benefit for Bill's kid, and dances as she never danced before. The place is crowded and the boys enthusiastically fling money upon the table for her, and she offers it to Rawlins in payment for Bill's note. Rawlins is filled with a new respect and love for Ginger, and tearing up the note, passes it with the money to Ginger, telling her to give it all to Bill's child. Ginger gives Rawlins a rose from her dress and stands looking after him with new interest.

THE PORTRAIT (Special—2 parts—March 10).—Keen competition is aroused among a group of young artists in New York City by the announcement of a valuable prize for the greatest portrait of the year, six months being given as the time limit of the competition. Dryden, a brilliant young artist, before starting his prize picture, decides first to take a trip to the country in search of inspiration. He meets with an accident near the cottage of Rosemary Blair, a quaint old lady. Mrs. Blair's one topic of conversation is her son, David, who has gone to New York to study art, and of whom she has lost all trace. She tells Dryden the story of the boy's venture into the world, and shows the artist his sketches. Dryden, out of compassion, hides from her love-blind eyes, the artistic impossibility of the boy's work, and promises, if possible, to get in touch with David, upon his return to New York.

Five months later, Dryden is busily at work on his portrait, the subject of which he will not divulge. David, half-starved, sullen and resentful at his failure in the art world, drifts into the student's quarter. He steals a loaf of bread and is saved from arrest by Hoyt, a skillful but unscrupulous artist. Hoyt is trying for the great prize and knowing that Dryden is the only artist who can compete with his work, determines to eliminate him. Between threats and bribes, he prevails upon David to visit Dryden's studio the night before the exhibition and mutilate the carefully guarded picture. David gains access to the studio and is about to rip the picture into ribbons, when he sees it is his own mother's portrait. Dryden, hearing a noise, enters and learns the identity of the intruder. Thinking of David's mother, Dryden forgives him and offers to accept him as his pupil. David's mother is sent for to witness the hanging of the portrait of herself and Dryden wins the prize. The dear old lady, while congratulating him, also says she considers him fortunate in having discovered David's undoubted talent. Her faith in her son is so strong and her mother-love so touching, Dryden does not disabuse her mind.

ART FOR A HEART (March 11).—When Dick Moore proposes to Aida Hamilton, his pretty young artist friend, she seems pleased, but tells him she can marry no one but an artist. Dick remembers that he once painted his father's fence, and did it well; so, turning to Aida he says, "Why, I've painted some in my time." She is highly delighted, and tells him of a vacant studio above her's which he ought to rent at once. Dick is not over-anxious, but dares not back out, so he hires the studio, fitting it up in true artistic style.

Aida shows him the announcement of a $1,000.00 prize for the best picture of any class shown at the National Gallery. She is going to try for it, and insists upon his doing likewise. Poor Dick, discouraged at his inability to paint, visits an exhibition to get an idea of the way it is done. He sees a crazy Futurist's daub, surrounded by an admiring crowd and immediately gets his idea. Locking himself in his studio, he throws eggs, cranberry sauce and vegetables at his canvas, adding some tobacco, celery and pieces of rags. Next he uses the top of a condensed milk can to represent the sun. He adds a few "final touches" and the picture is complete. It is indeed a realistic work of art.

Aida is heartbroken when her picture is refused acceptance by the Committee, but Dick's is accepted, and with his face half shaved, he rushes downstairs, meets Aida and ecstatically kisses her—incidentally giving her face a coating of lather. She congratulates him and they kiss again, regardless of the lather. They go to the exhibition and find that Dick's picture has won the thousand dollar prize. He is nearly overwhelmed, but finally straightens up with proper pride to receive the admiring plaudits of the crowd. Aida turns to Dick and says, "It's lovely, but what is it?" He replies, "A Futurist Adaptation of a September Morning!" She adoringly snuggles up to him and as he kisses her, gives her happy consent to his proposal that they be married at once.

THE WAY TO HEAVEN (March 12).—After losing the last of his money in a card game, Pete Carney, an habitual drunkard, goes home to his poor tenement and abuses his wife, Mary, and little daughter, Bessie. He is in an ugly mood. Finally he goes out. Outside the door of their room he stops and sees his wife, who has determined to leave him, take some money from an old sugar bowl. He rushes back, brutally grabs the money from her and departs. At a nearby saloon Pete is about to "sit in" at a game, lays the money on the table, when his wife, who has followed him, grabs the money and rushes back to the house. Pete, in a terrible rage, pursues her. Mary, in their room, shuts the door and leans against it. Pete outside, takes out a pocket knife and tries to cut the panels. He drives the blade through the door, and into Mary's breast. He is horrified when he discovers what has happened and flees.

Bessie finds her mother, and getting no response to her caresses, begins to cry. Neighbors learn of the tragedy and take care of little Bessie. They tell the child her mother has gone to Heaven and she steals out to find Heaven, and mother. After asking several strangers, she finally comes to a den of thieves, the leader of whom is called "The Fox." She asks him the way to Heaven, and tired out, climbs onto his lap. Pedro, one of the men, tries to steal the little girl's cross and chain, which "The Fox" prevents. They fight. "The Fox" is seriously wounded and asks her to pray for him. Then, although suffering from his wound, he succeeds in carrying her to a nearby convent, where she will receive the tender care of loving hearts. His mission fulfilled, he is overcome with emotion, and collapses, with a prayer on his lips.

MRS. MALONEY'S FORTUNE (March 13).—Mrs. Maloney, a poor widow, takes in washing for a living. She has a staunch admirer in Michael Finnegan. He tries to show his love by the many little attentions and kind assistance he gives her. She is very happy in her modest way until one day Michael brings her an imposing and suspicious-

DID WE OPEN

THE VITAGRAPH THEATRE

to demonstrate that VITAGRAPH FEATURES, when presented in the right way, will not only draw crowds, but will bring Higher Class Patronage at Higher Prices?

BECAUSE VITAGRAPH films are so UNIVERSALLY POPULAR and so SUPERIOR to others that the mere name "Vitagraph," is the surest, biggest and strongest box office magnet in the world.

EXHIBITORS

KNOW THIS—They write and say, "When we put out a Vitagraph poster it means BIG BUSINESS—when we run 'Vitagraph Nights,' it means PACKED HOUSES."

Seats are all reserved for regular Matinee and Evening Performances at the Vitagraph Theatre. The "HOUSE FULL" sign is hung out, and hundreds of "DOLLAR PATRONS" are turned away EVERY DAY.

BROADWAY STAR FEATURES (Name Protected in All Countries)

are not plays of International reputation. The Players are not of Stage Fame. The attractions have no "White Slave" or "Sex" appeal. They are simply "EXCLUSIVELY VITAGRAPH."

The Vitagraph Theatre IS NOT IN COMPETITION WITH EXHIBITORS WHO RUN PICTURE HOUSES

The Vitagraph Theatre is teaching the public and the Exhibitor that FILM MASTERPIECES are worthy of better than 5 and 10 cent admissions.

THE VITAGRAPH THEATRE will run only "BROADWAY STAR FEATURES," a Special Exclusive series of films, each program running a month or longer, without change.

will be given due announcement in our several advertising mediums.

MR. SAMUEL H. TRIGGER, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, said, in a congratulatory letter, dated February 9th, 1914:

> "It requires courage, enterprise and foresight of a high degree to take a chance of that kind. On behalf of the above Organization, I sincerely wish the Vitagraph Company every success. It is a step toward the uplift of motion picture exhibitions and something that will tend to educate the smaller exhibitors."

We thank our many friends for their kindly expressions of good will and assure them of our hearty and "Vitagraphic" co-operation, now and always.

looking envelope. She insists upon Michael opening it and they soon learn that she has fallen heir to a large fortune. After the legal preliminaries are closed, she takes possession of her wealth and decides that she will live in accordance with it. Michael bids her a fond farewell and tries to hide his sorrow at the parting as he drives her to the station.

In the city, she is initiated into the ethics of society. She makes a very poor hand at it, until she attends a dinner party, where she finds the liquid refreshments very much to her liking, and suffers for her overindulgence.

The next day she finds it difficult to content herself in quiet and starts on a slumming tour. She hears of a poor woman's sickness through a little boy who appeals to her sympathies, and with the national impulses of her big-heartedness, she goes with the child to his home, where she finds his mother dying, and from whom she receives some papers, before she passes away. Mrs. Maloney discovers that the boy, Teddy, is the rightful heir to the property of which she has become possessed. The child, now being an orphan, she takes it to her home, and goes back happily to her old ways of living, feeling that the environments are more to her taste and her personal fitness. Michael Finnegan happens to be passing the house when he sees it is occupied and learns the widow has returned. He rushes in, pops the question and receives the widow Maloney's consent, as her cheeks are filled with rose-like blushes, her eyes sparkle with joy and her lips quiver with ecstacy.

THE MISCHIEF MAKER (Special—2 parts—March 14).—Shortly after her arrival home from boarding school, Dolly Hoffman, with her chum, Anita, introduces Anita to an old friend of her's, Peter Drake, who is at first unable to decide between the girls as to which he would choose as his wife. Through an accident, he finds he is really in love with Dolly. Anita overhears his proposal, and is filled with hatred and jealousy. After their marriage, Anita succeeds in arousing Peter's jealousy, and through apparently compromising circumstances, leading him to believe his wife guilty of an affair with Billy. Dolly is horrified, but is unable to appease his unreasoning jealousy with satisfactory explanations, and a barrier of suspicion and coldness arises between them. Anita is delighted.

Anita drops Dolly a note, saying she is leaving on the 6:10 train. Peter also sends her a brief note, saying he is leaving on the same train, and tells her to communicate with his lawyer. Dolly is astounded and thinks she understands the meaning of the two notes. She calls up Billy, then Nell, one of her girl friends, and tells her plan. Peter is not overpleased at finding Anita on the same train, but she seems delighted and talks gushingly. Meanwhile Billy gets out his high-power roadster and after picking up Nell and Dolly, they start out to overhaul the 6:10 train, and get to the next stop ahead of the train. After an exciting race they arrive before the train. Peter, out of politeness, takes Anita's bag and on the platform they are confronted by his wife and her party. Peter looks utterly crushed. His wife ignores him and gradually it dawns upon him that Anita is a mischief-maker. He tries to explain and Dolly says, "If you wish to explain anything, you will find me at home." When Peter gets home he is very humble and while Dolly is at first scornful and apparently unrelenting, she finally forgives him and they promise each other no misunderstanding shall ever come between them again.

BIOGRAPH.

A BUNCH OF FLOWERS (March 2).—Even in the early courtship days our dogmatic young lover found no time to buy flowers. He took her love for granted and bought cigarettes. So later he made a bad husband, though his self-centered determination and popularity brought success abroad. Then a hitherto unknown little lady, called a wife woke up and made of him a popular and successful husband.

CHILDREN OF DESTINY (March 7).—The man left her with the brutal note, "A man of my ambition cannot live like this." From a marriage announcement the son learned the identity of his father and swore to find this man who had caused his mother's death. Years later, used as a dupe to catch his own sister, he found his long sought opportunity for vengeance, but "Blood is thicker than water."

POLITICS AND SUFFRAGETTES (March 5).—No wonder they were "bum" politicians and out of a job. They opposed the suffragettes. Sorrowfully they went to the land of nod and there boomed a campaign for the lady candidate for the anti-suffragette party. Across the country they flew, stopping at every town along the line. Sometimes they struck a town of "antis" and went right into the heart of every mother, and sometimes where every man was a married "suffragette." But two fair suffragettes invaded the party and put an end to politics.

PA AND MA ELOPE (March 5).—The usual haunt of May and Billy is at the candy store. Pa finds them there. But two determined lovers are not usually separated, and back at the house, it is up to ma to send Billy on his way again. Billy comes back at moonlight and ma discovers his awful perfidy—so does pa. They all meet at the minister's, but it is certainly one on pa and ma.

EDISON.

THE SULTAN AND THE ROLLER SKATES (March 9).—The Sultan was a sentimentalist. Some men are of the impression that it is impossible for them to love more than one woman, but the Sultan was not so constituted. Every few months he fell in love with some girl or other, and invariably he married her. At the time our story opens, he had twenty wives.

When word was brought to the Sultan that a beautiful American girl, with wheels on her feet had been captured by bandits in one of the outlying portions of his realms, his collector's instinct was aroused. In his entire list of wives, he did not have a single American. None of his wives had wheels on their feet. Instantly he commanded that the fair captive should be brought before him.

Mae Higgins, the American girl, was lady champion roller-skater of Keokuk, Ia. While the bandits were dragging her to the Sultan, she met Sam Spaulding, the young man with whom she had won the roller-tango contest at the last Firemans' and Farmers' Ball. Mae hastily explained her plight to Sam, and he quickly formulated a plan to save her.

In accordance with his plan, Mae pretended to be deaf and dumb, and as the wheels were not in evidence upon her feet, the Sultan dismissed her from his presence in a rage. Sam borrowed a couple of sample cases from three drummers, who had been trying in vain to sell roller skates to the Sultan's subjects, and gained admittance to the Harem. He was captured by the guards and dragged before the Sultan. With immediate execution hanging over his head, he showed the Sultan the roller skates, and offered to teach the Harem how to use them.

The Sultan consented and Sam equipped the entire outfit with the skates. While everybody else was skating about on the back of his or her respective neck, Sam and Mae skimmed lightly out of the Harem. Once past the doors, the guards who followed in pursuit were no match for the expert skaters. In a short time they were safe aboard Sam's uncle's yacht, and on their way back to Keokuk.

Some More About Moving Picture Machines

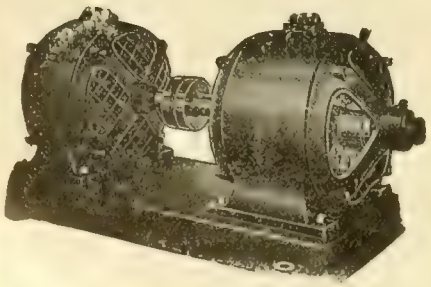
When a patron of yours buys a ticket and enters your theatre, it is with the intention of relaxing from the strain and worry of business. He wants to rest and enjoy himself. A perfect picture on the screen is necessary in order to accomplish this effect. If you are using old, worn-out machines, making big noise which can be heard all over the house, and a flickering, waving and vibrating picture on the screen, you cannot expect to hold his patronage. You may pay for the best film service in the world, but you will spoil the picture and lose your patronage if your light is not brilliant and your picture steady and flickerless. Put your entire energy into producing a perfect picture. To accomplish this, proceed as follows:

1—Trade your old machine for a new one.

2—INSTALL A "HALLBERG" ECONOMIZER TO IMPROVE YOUR LIGHT AND CUT YOUR ELECTRIC BILL.

3—Secure the services of a good operator.

4—Never use junk film, but you may use old film in good mechanical condition. It has been proven time and again that it is not the newness of the film which brings the business. It is the way the picture is put on, and by putting in a modern equipment you can save on your film service and put on a better show.



HALLBERG A. C. TO D. C. ECONOMIZER FOR ONE OR TWO LAMPS.

I am distributor of POWER'S No. 6-A CAMERAGRAPH, SIMPLEX PROJECTOR, THE MOTIOGRAPH and the EDISON KINETOSCOPE. If you have trouble, write to me, but give all particulars as to make and style of machine, distance from lens to screen and size of picture, kind of current, state voltage and cycles, and if you have a current saver state make and style. I will then assist you or offer such suggestions as may be necessary to secure for you a perfect picture.

I take old machines in trade as part payment for new ones, and I also make liberal allowance on your old rheostats. A. C. Economizers, A. C. to D. C. Converters and Rectifiers in trade for the celebrated "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizers, which give the BEST LIGHT with the LEAST CURRENT.

THE MEXICAN'S GRATITUDE (March 10).—When Rosita McMullen, of Silver Plume, Colorado, married Madison Lane, the Frio Kid attended the wedding celebration on Christmas Day, shot three men, and rode away after expressing the pleasant hope that on some future Christmas he might return, and present Madison with a neat little present in the shape of a few ounces of lead. Thereafter the Frio Kid embarked on a fervid career. Accompanied by the notorious Mexican Frank, he dynamited trains, shot bank messengers, and did other things incompatible with good citizenship. Throughout it all, he never forgot Madison Lane.

One Christmas Day, three years later, the Frio Kid, riding up to a cross roads store at dusk, heard a man talking about a party to be held that night at Madison Lane's house. The reason the man was talking was because he had been chosen to appear as Santa Claus. The Kid rode back to his camp thoughtfully and confided an amiable little plan to Mexican Frank. The plan consisted simply in shooting the would-be Santa Claus, attiring himself in his garb, and then killing Madison Lane at a favorable opportunity. Now, some years before, Rosita had done Mexican Frank a great kindness, and the outlaw had never forgotten it.

The party at the house was in full swing when Santa Claus arrived. After the presents had been distributed to the delighted children, Santa withdrew to an adjoining room with Lane. In a few moments he returned.

"Mrs. Lane," he said, "I've left your Christmas present in the next room."

Madison Lane was in the next room with arms and head sprawled on the table—no, not dead—asleep. When he awoke and kissed his wife, Mexican Frank appeared at the window, and blessed them silently.

Meanwhile, the Frio Kid was lying out under the stars with a bullet through his heart.

ANDY, THE ACTOR (Fourth of the Andy series—March 11).—After Andy had made his startling and unexpected success on the stage, he received so flattering an offer from a theatrical manager that he decided to give up his modest position at the messenger office, and to cast his lot permanently with the stars of the dramatic world. The manager in question was not one of the aristocrats of the stage world with two or three theaters on Broadway and a "circuit." He was simply an ordinary man, who borrowed two or three hundred dollars every once in a while and started out on the road with a show. Sometimes the show would go as far as Pittsfield, Mass., or Binghamton, N. Y. Ordinarily it walked back to New York from New Rochelle.

The title of the manager's latest endeavor was "The Hero of Rattlesnake Valley." On the billboards, Andy was featured as the hero. The play opened in a small town not far from New York, under the most auspicious circumstances. The populace, excited by the none too modest advance notices, cheered the actors to the echo. Andy, with the first taste of public adulation in his mouth, found it all very gratifying. His opinion of himself did not shrink to any alarming extent.

Whatever else may be said of "The Hero of Rattlesnake Valley," it must be admitted that there was plenty of action in it. From start to finish there was hardly a moment which could have been characterized as dull. In the first act there was a fight between Andy and the villain, and a kidnapping. In the second act, Andy, concealed in a trunk, followed the kidnappers, and after two tremendous fights, was captured by them. They bound him to a tree, lighted a fire, and left him, but he escaped from his dreadful situation by gnawing the ropes. In the last act, things progress rapidly to the great climax, a revolver fight between Andy and the villains.

Ever since the middle of the first act, slight sighs of restlessness might have been observed in the audience. In the midst of the revolver fight, a potato suddenly arrived on the stage, followed by a fusillade from a long suffering gallery. There is little else to tell. They walked back to New York. The manager looked about for another $200 and Andy became a messenger boy again.

THE PRICE OF THE NECKLACE (Special—2 parts—March 13).—Henry Lyons was one of the country's greatest men of business. When he beckoned with his finger, presidents of banks and railroads listened attentively to the words which were to follow, and when he clenched his fist, it frequently happened that millions changed hands slightly afterwards. Mrs. Lyons, his wife, was one of the leaders in the smart set. Her gowns, her diamonds, her dinners, were heralded throughout the country, from Eastport to San Diego. One day, it happened that she wanted a necklace. A necklace of pink pearls. So she asked her husband for it.

Mr. Lyons shrugged his shoulders. A necklace of the sort his wife wanted would cost $80,000, and though that was relatively nothing, it seemed to him that she was a little extravagant. Couldn't she wait until Christmas? Pretty Mrs. Lyons stamped her foot with impatience. "How stupid!" she said, "Can't you make the market do something or other, and get it for me that way?" Lyons looked a little serious. Then he nodded. "All right, my dear" he said, "You shall have it."

Now Mr. Lyons knew that a certain railroad was not going to pay its dividend, and he knew just when the news was going to leak out, so, through his agents, he bought the stock of that road until it crept up, and up, and up to where it had never been before. Then slowly and quietly, he began to sell to the eager market. First in 500 share lots, then in 1,000, then in 3,000, then he flung his entire holdings on the market and sold many thousands of shares short. Just at that minute, the news came out, the market crashed down to the bottom, Mr. Lyons raked in his profits, and bought the necklace.

Mrs. Lyons was giving a magnificent dance when a poor woman came and asked to see her. The poor woman's entire savings, together with the savings of thousands of others, had been wiped out in the crash. Why had it happened? To buy her a pearl necklace. With sudden horror, the woman realized what it cost the world to keep her in luxury, and silently she promised herself that her future life should be spent in the attempt to make amends.

AN AFFAIR OF DRESS (Third of the Dolly of the Dailies—March 14).—It will be remembered that Dolly was engaged by Mrs. Yorke, a fashionable member of the smart set, to write a society column for the "Comet." Dolly furnished the brains and did the work. Mrs. Yorke received the money. After she had received a few unpleasant proofs of her employer's unreasonable selfishness, Dolly shook the dust of the Yorke mansion from her feet, and departed. In the course of her gathering of society notes, Dolly had met Minnie, a mannikin in a fashionable tailoring establishment. As luck would have it, there was a vacancy when Dolly arrived to ask Minnie about her work, and twenty-four hours after her quarrel with Mrs. Yorke, the girl was engaged at Browngrass' as a mannikin, with the princely salary of twenty-five dollars a week.

Let it not be supposed that she was entirely infatuated with her position. She had come to the city to write, and write she would eventually. This was merely a makeshift—a temporary bar to keep the wolf from the door. There were other reasons too, why her situation did not satisfy her. The proprietor was kind—a little too kind, Dolly thought. One afternoon, he tried to kiss her, and she, quite naturally, slapped his face. In the midst of all her little difficulties, Dolly was not allowing herself to drift out of touch with the magazine and newspaper world. A poem sent by her to the "Jester," brought a gratifying return in the shape of a letter from the editor inquiring into her capabilities for a small editorial position. Later, the editor called, and since he was a nice sort of person, Dolly took dinner with him. In the excitement of the moment, she sailed off to the restaurant in the gown she was wearing.

As it happened, the proprietor of Browngrass' came to the restaurant, saw the gown, called a policeman, and ordered him to arrest Dolly. Aid came from an unexpected quarter. Rockwell Crosby, editor of the "Comet," was sitting at the next table. He discovered that Dolly had written Mrs. Yorke's column, showed his card to the policeman, and ordered him to remove the angry proprietor. Dolly, he said, had no connection with Browngrass'. She was his star reporter. After the man had been removed and Dolly thanked Crosby for his kind lie, he told her it was the truth. She was engaged.

SLUMBERVILLE'S CASE (Mar. 10).—Joe Prine, a rube, while walking along a country road, sees a wicked looking Italian apparently about to murder a woman with a baby in her arms. Terrified, Joe rushes to the town constable and frantically begs him to come to the scene. The country cop climbs the ladder and, with the aid of his spy-glasses, sees a dago chasing a woman and throwing bombs at her. Sliding down the ladder, the constable rushes to the station house and calls out the entire police force. After an exciting chase, which terrorizes the whole town, they finally arrive at the scene of the supposed crime, only to find that it is a moving picture company rehearsing.

A DANGEROUS CASE (Mar. 10).—Tom Jones plans to go to a mask ball, but Mrs. Jones finds the ticket and takes away his clothes. In the morning he pretends to be sick. She doesn't know that he is going with the doctor, and that he has had the doctor on the 'phone. The doctor comes and sends for Jim Clark, who poses as a nurse. Jones is painted up and his wife is told he has smallpox. She is sent to her mother's. That evening she 'phones to the house and, receiving no reply, decides that he is dead and starts for home.

Meantime, Jim has decided to stay al night with Jones. He has hung his wrap on the door knob and does not answer the bell. When Mrs. Jones gains admittance she finds her husband in bed with what she at first thinks is a woman, but soon sees her mistake and starts to shoot up the house. Jim beats it and Jones receives a good thrashing for his trick.

A CRUEL REVENGE (Special—2 parts—Mar. 11).—Lily Adair is forced by her society-struck mother to live far beyond their means. Her mother hopes that Lily will eventually make a good match, and to this end encourages the advances of Stephen Peters, a multi-millionaire, seventy years old. On a day when the bills have come in thick and fast, when the servants have been asking for wages overdue, and the girl feels

PLAIN FACTS to EXCHANGEMEN and EXHIBITORS

THERE is one FACT which all Exchange Men and all Exhibitors should KNOW. That fact is this: Every man or woman who has ever had an interest in a HELEN GARDNER production HAS MADE MONEY. THERE HAS NEVER BEEN A FAILURE. The reason for this fact is so simple that it is startling: THERE HAS NEVER BEEN A HELEN GARDNER PRODUCTION THAT WAS NOT AS PERFECT AS A KEEN APPRECIATION OF DRAMATIC VALUES, CULTURE AND ARTISTIC TASTE COULD MAKE IT. One value these productions possess which, by itself, lifts them above and beyond the drivel of the conventional, and that value is their ORIGINALITY. Every one of these picture plays contains an idea, and is builded upon a motive, and possesses a technical finish and perfection which would warrant its reproduction by the Edwards-Zetler Feature Film Company, at Dayton, Ohio. They have it in a territory where competition is fierce: AND THEY ARE DOING, as they will tell you, A PHENOMENAL BUSINESS WITH IT. Without a doubt it is the most exquisite, the most interesting and laugh-inducing motion picture ever made in America, and the peer of any ever made anywhere. WIRE ABOUT "BAGDAD." Behind this announcement is another announcement, to be made in a few weeks, which will be the best news ever published to state-rights men. THERE IS SOMETHING DOING IN AMERICA AS WELL AS IN ITALY, GOOD AMERICAN CITIZENS! But concerning these matters more will be said later on. at the end of her resources, old Peters proposes. The girl is horrified at first, but feeling it is the only way out, she accepts him. But later the girl realizes the immensity of her act and sends back his ring. As he walks up and down the room in anger he hears a noise against the window. He opens it to disclose a man in convict garb cowering on the ledge. There is no fight left in the hunted starving man, and he pleads for shelter.

Peters gets an idea. He will dress this ex-convict as a gentleman, introduce him to society, force him to pay attention to Lily Adair and when they become engaged, humble her pride by a disclosure of facts. A month later the convict, as Sir John Clyde, meets Lily Adair at a ball. They fall in love and before long become engaged. On the day the engagement is to be announced Peters calls up the warden of the jail and tells him where an escaped convict is to be found that evening. As John rises to toast his bride-to-be, the warden and the police enter. As John is about to be lead away two gentlemen enter. One announces himself as the British Consul and tells them his companion is the Earl of Clyde, John's brother. Proceedings are stopped as the Earl tells that years before John and the present Earl (Seymour), brothers, came to America to work in a large bank. They were of good family, but poor. Seymour was addicted to gambling and lost all his money at cards. One day he borrowed some funds from the bank, hoping to recoup his losses, but he lost that also. Desperate, he returned to his rooms to find a letter from an English law firm, stating that his cousin had died, leaving him next in kin to his uncle, the Earl's title. He does not know what to do and confesses his crime to John, who feels that, as younger brother, it is his duty to protect the name. He shoulders his brother's crime and sends Seymour back to England. When John realizes his love for Lily he wrote his brother, asking for the truth at last, and in response to his letter, the Earl came to America. All are convinced of John's innocence. Peters, his plan of vengeance frustrated, leaves the house angrily. The Earl enters into conversation with the warden, while Lily goes into John's outstretched arms.

A STRANGE MELODY (Special—2 parts—Mar. 12).—Jack Bowdoin, a gambler, had killed his man and gloried in it; yet he had a strange passion for music and had installed in his private room an organ where, without instruction, he had grasped the works of the great sacred masters. Among his customers was a young man named Carl Colt, who nightly gambled his small salary. His sister, Mary, an organist at the church, came one night to Bowdoin's casino and requested an interview. Being shown into the private room, she ran her fingers over the keys of the organ. Bowdoin entered and listened, then exclaimed, "I will give you a thousand dollars if you can make me play like that." Mary immediately spoke of her mission and begged the gambler to cure her brother of his passion for the game.

At this moment a shot rang out in the casino and Bowdoin found Carl defending himself against a desperado, Shorty Hall, who had stolen a bet from the table. Shorty was ejected and Mary and her father continued the plea for the reformation of Carl. Hall and some of his companions abducted Mary and held her for ransom. Bowdoin rescued Mary. He then begged to know how he could be worthy of the friendship of so pure a girl. She told him.

Jack sold his casino and renounced gambling. After convicting the abductors of Mary he saw an insane woman committed to the asylum; she had a little child and Jack agreed to adopt her and put up bond for the child's good care. Mary agreed to take charge of the little girl for which Jack paid well. The circumstance brought them into notice, and was enhanced by the fact that Mary would often take Jack to the organ loft and teach him the sacred music. The talk of the church folks became loud and caused a duel in which Jack was wounded. Mary cared for him at the hospital and the ex-gambler urged that there was only one way to stop the tongues of the deacons of the church. He pleaded and Mary consented to go to the church and be married.

THE TELL-TALE STAR (Mar. 13).—Ben Carter, manager of "Two-X" ranch, discovers that "Red" Delvin has converted his shack into a "speak-easy." Ben sends for "Red" and tells him that either he must quit selling liquor to the men, or leave the ranch. During the interview, "Red" notes a pair of Ben's boots. Each of the heel bottoms is decorated with a star fashioned in hobnails. "Red" boards up the front of his shack, but continues to do business. Ben accidentally finds "Red's" supply of liquor in a clump of bushes and smashes the demijohns. When "Red" discovers his loss, he sees in the moist path the print of a star heel. Furious, "Red" hurries to his shack and their attempts to beat Kate, his daughter, blaming her for revealing the hiding place of the liquor. Kate escapes and runs to the ranch office, pursued by "Red." Ben protects the girl and orders the cowboys to put "Red" and his Mexican partner, Jose, off the ranch.

Camped in a ravine just outside the ranch, "Red" and Jose await their chance to get even. The opportunity comes the next day when the cowboys start for the round-up, leaving Ben and Kate alone at the settlement. Ben saddles his horse for a trip to the village. Finding he has forgotten an important paper, he slings his revolver and belt over the horn of the saddle and walks back to the office. While he is gone "Red" and Jose appear at the barns and appropriate Ben's revolver. Kate overhears them plotting and hurries to the ranch office to warn Ben. It is too late to escape. His revolver gone, Ben determines on concealment. He and Kate climb through the trap door in the ceiling of the office and hide in the attic. "Red," leaving Jose on guard, enters the office. Not finding Ben, "Red" determines to await his return. The ceiling is plastered and the rafters bare. Ben makes a mis-step and his foot goes through the ceiling. "Red" quickly recognizes the star on the heel and in a flash lassos the boot, fastening the rope to a peg in the wall. "Red" calls in Jose and orders him to rustle a bunch of horses, showing him that Ben is a prisoner. Meanwhile, Ben turns a trick. Finding a stout nail in the rafter where his foot went through, Ben hooks the boot strap over the nail and draws his foot out of the boot. This leaves him free, while the boot is still held by the rope. With Jose gone, Ben and Kate crawl through the window and lower themselves to the ground. Kate gets away on Ben's horse without being seen and starts in pursuit of the cowboys. Ben bravely enters the window in the office at "Red's" back and attacks the ruffian. In the fight the revolver is discharged, bringing Jose to the scene. Kate returns with the cowboys just in time to rescue Ben and make prisoners of "Red" and Jose.

SHE WANTED A COUNT (Mar. 14).—May receives a letter telling her that a real count is to call on her. She begins to treat Bob (her sweetheart) rather cold. Her brother, Dick, notices this, but is puzzled to account for it, until he finds the letter, which explains her actions. The day on which the count is to call Dick hires a tramp whom he dresses up as a count, while Bob is disguised with whiskers (clipped from the tramp's beard) and passes as the count's secretary. The real count is waylaid, bound and gagged, and hidden under a bush. The bogus count is then introduced to May, and he proceeds to make things merry. At the dinner table he disgusts the family, especially father. May is discouraged and begins to long for Bob. Father takes a hand and has the count thrown out. Bob slips out and removes his disguise and returns to receive father's blessings. The gardner releases the real count; he dashes for the house. At the front door the bogus and the real count meet. They clash. The tramp being a fighter, he picks the nobleman up and dumps him in a passing ash cart.

JUST A NOTE (Mar. 14).—Harry Reynolds is engaged to Lucy Clayton. Harry's colored valet, Sam, is in love with Roxy, Lucy's colored maid. Jake, a tough coon, is also in love with Roxy and at the point of a gun warns Sam to let his girl alone. Sam asks his boss to write him a love letter so that he can send it to his girl. Sam sends the letter to Roxy. Lucy finds the letter in her room, where Roxy had left it. Lucy cannot understand the letter, as it is in Harry's hand writing, which she is familiar with. When Roxy claims ownership to the letter Lucy is horrified to think her sweetheart would write to the colored maid and before Roxy can explain it is from Sam, Lucy drives her from the room. In the afternoon when Harry calls he is met at the front door by Lucy's Pa with a gun. Harry takes it on the run with the old man following and shooting after him. In the meantime Roxy tells Sam of the trouble. Jake, in rage over losing Roxy, starts a shooting chase with Sam in the lead. They all meet on the road, explanations follow and when Jake's gun is empty Sam wipes out his razor and if not for Roxy interfering Sam would have sent a new black angel aloft.

THE COUNTER-MELODY (March 10).—Franz leaves his humble home in Holland to seek a career. Hilda, his sweetheart, is left behind to wait until such a time that Franz could send for her. After months of struggling in the new country, Franz finally gets a position as leader of an orchestra. He later writes a beautiful symphony, but is discouraged with the orchestra and finally gives up his job. Hilda fails to hear from Franz and goes to America in search of him. Days and weeks pass and still she does not find her lover. Franz is becoming melancholy, when he hears a beautiful melody being played on a violin in the next room. It develops to be Hilda, and unconsciously the counter-melody to the symphony. A happy ending takes place.

THE GIRL, THE COP, THE BURGLAR (March 11).—Thomas Terpin, James Riding and Jack Hazard are sitting in the club when the talk drifts to a daring housebreaker, whom the police are powerless to capture. Jack makes a wager with Terpin that he can rob and get away with it. Terpin takes him up and agrees to pay a forfeit of $100 if Jack returns to the club within three hours with something valuable he has stolen. The adventures he has are screamingly funny and the climax comes with most amazing and amusing results.

THE WARNING (March 12).—Nellie Haney and Larry Dale are sweethearts, but for some reason or other, Nellie's father doesn't like Larry and will not allow her to see him. Not to be outdone by father, Nellie and Larry have arranged a signal system and when she wants to see Larry, she attaches an old table cover to a broomstick, places it in a knot hole near the roof and waves it up and down. Scott Lawson, a squawman and a notorious character, is abusive to his squaw. He enters the cabin while Nellie is alone and is attempting to force his attentions upon the frightened girl, when her father enters. Knowing Haney has a bag of money in the house to pay the men, he locks Nellie in a clothes-closet, forces Haney into a chair and is looking for a rope to tie his hands, when he sees the signal rope hanging down. Not knowing what it is, he jerks it down, and Larry seeing the well-known signal, dashes down the trail and saves the girl and her father. Realizing that he was mistaken in the boy, Haney now raises his objections and tells Nellie and Larry they may marry any time they wish.

THE INTERFERENCE OF BRONCHO BILLY (March 14).—Old Carl Stockdale is an habitual drunkard and the cause of much unhappiness to his daughter, Marguerite. Broncho Billy meets Stockdale's charming daughter and becomes very much interested in her, and realizes the sad state of affairs in the home on account of the father's failing. Marguerite sends her father to a famous drink cure in the city and he returns home cured, but, "if a drop of liquor touches his lips, it will prove fatal to him." The boys scheme in many ways to force Stockdale to drink, but each time are outwitted by Broncho Billy. When Broncho Billy asks Marguerite to become his wife, she willingly consents to trust her happiness to one who will protect and guide her over the rough places.

GRASS COUNTY GOES DRY (Special—2 parts—March 13).—Grass County went "dry" and as a consequence so did Hollow Center, which was located in Grass County. The drug store was owned by Doctor Perkins.

Just before the county went dry a temperance society was formed in the Center and great rivalry existed between Deacon Carpenter and Doctor Perkins for the presidency. As election day approached, the Deacon seemed to be the most likely candidate, and as day by day he gained new friends and supporters, his stock in the heart of Widow Green went rocketing, where before it had been very below par, owing to the bullish tactics of Doc Perkins.

The Deacon was never much on looks, but he realized that he must keep up appearances before the widow. His beauty had one drawback: his hair. Then the crowning sorrow of his life came: his hair began to fall out, and as his hair decreased in quantity so did the love of Widow Green for the Deacon. He kept more and more to himself, while Doc Perkins, campaigning about town in great style, gradually won over the greater majority of the people.

In the meantime the Deacon was trying everything known to the scientist of hair (the barber) in the village, but to no avail. Then the Deacon found a city newspaper and discovered in Aunt Jane's "Beauty Column" a remedy for falling hair—but one of the principal factors was "Whiskey!" Now the Center was dry, and he running for the office of president of the temperance society was known to be a temperance man. But he must have the whiskey—absolutely—but how was he to get it? To go to Doc Perkins and ask for whiskey spelled ruin. No! he could not do that. Ah! he had it—he would bribe Beavens, the driver of the stagecoach, whose daily ride took him over to Tree County, which was "wet." So Bevans went, but on his return journey he picked up Doc Perkins.. Deacon Carpenter was anxiously waiting for Beavens. Beavens arrived and slyly slipped the bottle to the Deacon. This action was seen by the Doc. He thought a lot, but said nothing.

Deacon went home and prepared his tonic. Then he went to the meeting which was to be held in the town hall. He went and the smell of whiskey accompanied him. So it was that when he got up to speak a strange rustling sound seemed to take place in the hall. A little breeze stirred, and carried on it a very distinct smell of "licker!" Doc Perkins smelled it and so did the rest. Doc Perkins found out where the smell came from.

Poor Deacon was ousted and ostracised. The Deacon wended his way homeward and the scent clung to him. He passed two tramps who were disgusted with the dryness of the town. The Deacon passed, but the tramps followed. He arrived home swearing vengeance. He would be handsome in spite of all these adversities.

That the lotion was doing its work there was no doubt, for the Deacon found no hair on his coat; so he gave his hair another dose. He then turned round. When he turned round again he saw a retreating hand attached to a retreating arm, which belonged to an about-to-retreat tramp. The Deacon gave a shout and the chase started. They passed the meeting house (the meeting had just let out). The good people of the town were horrified to see the Deacon pursuing two tramps with the whiskey. The tramps escaped and were later found—intoxicated. They vindicated the Deacon. The election and also the Doc's wig came off. The Deacon won the election and also incidentally the Widow Green.

GEORGE KLEINE.

THE GREATEST GIFT (Cines Spec.—2 parts—Mar. 10).—Doctor Beverly, an oculist, loses a large sum in a gambling house and in order to pay his debt of honor, forges the signature of his father-in-law, thus "robbing Peter to pay Paul." Remorse takes hold upon his conscience and Beverly leaving a note of farewell, goes into the gardens, where he kisses his wife and two daughters good-bye, and a few hours later he embarks upon a voyage to America. A few years later death takes the father-in-law and poverty stalks into the home where prosperity and happiness once reigned.

In a foreign land Beverly, unable to obtain employment, attempts suicide. This he does by throwing himself beneath the wheels of a motor car. The catastrophe is averted, however, by Miss Wood, a rich American heiress, who drives the car. He is taken to her home, where he meets her father who is suffering from a supposedly incurable blindness. In the days of his rejuvenation that follow, Dr. Beverly effects the complete cure of the old millionaire. Meanwhile, Miss Wood begins to show great affection for the Doctor and he, knowing his position, and feeling a yearning for his family at home, leaves his benefactors and sails for his native city.

In the home that he had left, where now poverty reigns, the failing eyesight of the grief-stricken mother finally results in total blindness. The two daughters now grown to womanhood, carefully save their few pennies in the hope that an operation might restore her eyesight. In his native city Dr. Beverly soon gains great fame as an oculist, operating under the name of Dr. Rodriguez. He makes an unavailing search for his family and finally gives up all hope of ever seeing them again. It was then that the two girls came to him. Beverly immediately recognized his daughters and joyfully disclosed his identity. The three conspirators then plotted to tell the mother nothing of the good news. A few weeks later the operation was performed and when the bandages were taken from her eyes, the mother found no difficulty in forgiving her wayward husband in the joy of the reunion.

SELIG.

THE SMUGGLER'S SISTER (March 3).—Bessie a fisherman's daughter, loves the seashore and everything connected with it. Her big brother is her idol, but she deprecates his desire to evade governmental duties and smuggle. She knows the cave where he lands his goods and resorts there to meet him. A keen-eyed revenue officer half suspects the beach beauty, but he wavers between the regard for her and the reward that the Government will give for the capture of the man who has been "putting it over" in that locality.

The brother has rowed his boat, coming from a sloop in the offing, when the officer discovers the pernicious activity through his binoculars. The girl, about the same time, observes her brother and runs to him, expostulating upon the dangers of dodging duty. Her sisterly advice sinks in, and the young man finally declares solemnly that he will never smuggle again. She has hardly left the rendezvous when the revenue officer, who has taken the scene in from afar, meets her. He tries to snatch a kiss from her, and puts it as a disarm to a threat: "Give me a kiss and I'll shut my eyes." Maidenly modesty flames her cheek and inflames her temper. Thereupon the lovelorn revenue officer calls his minions, rushes into the cave and overcomes the smuggler. The big brother is handcuffed and thrown into a boat. Then the boat is shoved off the shore and tethered with a long rope. The officer ties the boat to a rock and again seeks out Bessie. She has come back to the cave and is much worried over the absence of her brother. The officer tells her he has caught her brother, but will free him on condition. He again resumes his unwelcome attentions, and she escapes him. She plunges into the water, swims to the boat and unbinds her brother. The officer attempts to capture them, but cannot swim. He runs for help, stumbles and falls over a cliff and is badly hurt. Bessie and her brother, who have come ashore at the sight, minister to him, and, unknown, the girl gets from him the key and unlocks the handcuffs on her brother. A few days later, the officer, who has recovered from his injuries, but is still in bandages, gets a letter from headquarters reprimanding him for not getting his man. Once again he tries the game of capturing—once again the beauty disarms him, and so, with a despairing glance, he tears the star from the bosom of his uniform as the scene dims.

THE COUNTESS AND THE BURGLAR (March 4).—A titled lady, gorgeously gowned, returning from a ball, enters her boudoir, and is about to disrobe for the night. As she sits at her dressing-table removing the necklace of jewels from her throat, she sees by reflection in the mirror a movement of the portieres, and observing a coarse shoe projecting below, immediately surmises some burglarious intruder is ensconced behind the drapery. In spite of the discovery of such a dangerous intruder, the Countess goes calmly about her affairs, placing her jewels in a casket, and finally, with the aid of a hassock on a chair, puts the casket on a high self in the closet. Retiring to a lavatory, she dons her negligee, returns, sits again before the mirror, takes down her hair, and brushes and braids it for the night.

She simulates weariness, drops upon the couch and is soon apparently asleep. The burglar in the window alcove, judging from the spell of silence, concludes to get busy. He tears the curtains aside, steals into the room, looks for the jewel casket and then discovers it on the high shelf where the Countess had placed it. He steps into the closet, preparatory to looting, when the Countess nimbly darts to the closet door, snaps the lock and rings for the servants. As they rush in, the nerve strain of it all crowds upon her, so that she faints as she explains pointing toward the door, behind which is ensconced the dangerous visitor. The servants quickly summon the police, who capture the burglar, and the Countess saves her jewels.

LITTLE LILLIAN TURNS THE TIDE (March 5).—William Rockwell, a young married man, whose wife and only child are his idols, is doing fairly well, when consumption attacks him, and fighting as he will, he suddenly finds himself face to face with poverty. The doctor advises him that he must needs go to Arizona, or expect sudden death. There is no money for such a trip. Grace, his wife, is in despair, and at this juncture the landlord enters and demands the rent. He secretly admires the wife, and in his dark soul now sees the light of a chance to take advantage of her. He offers to advance the money for the husband's trip. Grace is delighted, and at once signs a note for the amount. Then, having dispatched her husband to Arizona, she starts out "typing" to support herself and her little daughter. Discouraged by the meagerness of the income, she starts to writing photoplays. She sends them out with hope and regularity, but one by one they come hopelessly drifting back.

In the interim, Orm, the landlord, has been harassing her with his attentions, and finally demands that she either accept his admiration or vacate his property in lieu of the rent long overdue. About this time, little Lillian loses her pet rabbit, and is greatly distressed; so that she goes to her mother's typewriter, picks out a few words descriptive of her loss, and posts it to the scenario editor of one of the moving picture companies. Observing that the envelope is thin, and the ones dispatched by her mother are bulky, in order to make her's look like something, she picks up odds and ends from the table. Among these is a tintype of herself, and a pathetic letter from the sick husband to his little family. Now, the scenario editor is touched by the combined contents of the envelope and confers with the manager. As a result, Lillian gets a fine position as a child actress, and Grace, her mother, is taken on for minor parts. Money is sent to the father; he rallies and is restored to health and reunited to his family, all brought about through the busy brain of Lillian.

THE RENEGADE'S VENGEANCE (March 6).—Ben Clayton marries Virginia, the daughter of a ranchman, against her father's will. This stirs up a feud among the neighboring cattlemen, who refuse to have anything further to do with the pair. Ben and his wife, however, have no concern over this and they live happily on their lonely ranch for the next ten years. During this time their boy has grown up to be quite a lad, but his grandfather has never seen him. Virginia is taken ill and pleads with Ben to go to her parent and ask him to come to see them. He starts out, and along the way encounters a drunken Mexican beating his wife. Ben jumps from his horse, soundly trounces the Mexican, and takes the poor wife back with him to his home to take care of Virginia while he is away. He finds the ranchman still unrelenting and returns alone.

In the interim, the Mexican, who has trailed his wife to Ben's ranch, endeavors to break in and take her with him against her wishes. Ben arrives just in time to prevent his carrying out this purpose and drives him away. The Mexican retaliates by returning a little later and stealing a horse. The nine-year-old boy, Roy, sees him, and mounting his own pony, gives chase. The Mexican, arriving at his cabin first, tidies it up, makes it attractive, and meeting the boy at the door, invites him in. The youth is disarmed and enters. Then the Mexican, after gaining the boy's confidence, starts out for a pail of water, but instead mounts and rides off with both horses. Roy becomes accidentally caught in a wolf trap in the cabin, and in his struggle to free himself knocks over a small stove. The cabin is soon in flames. The boy's grandfather sees the distant smoke, and with some of his cowboys rides over to investigate the cause. Arriving on the scene, and hearing the boy's cries, he rushes in and drags him out just as the cabin collapses. When the boy recovers under the kindly ministrations of the old ranchman, he reveals his identity and the grandfather finds that he has rescued his own grandson. He then goes back home with him and the family are happily reunited after years.

SUPPRESSED NEWS (March 10).—George Garfield, star reporter, accompanies Mildred Latham to the Twentieth National Bank to visit her father, Horace Latham, the president. He discovers the directors' room is full of excited men and at once "scents a story." Through a ruse, he gets the president's secretary out of the room and then listens at the keyhole of the door, learning that the bank is trembling on the verge of failure. An unfortunate sneeze betrays his presence. Latham rushes in, captures Garfield and then to prevent the publication of the story, locks him up in an ante-room. Garfield telephones to Mildred of his incarceration a moment before the instrument is torn out. She hurries to the bank and learns the details from the private secretary, and sides with her sweetheart against her father. From the sidewalk she flashes a reflection into the ante-room with the aid of a small mirror. Garfield has written the story and drops his notebook out of the window, and she carries it to the office of the "Express," where its contents causes much excitement.

Garfield falls asleep and in his dream observes a run on the bank. Then follow a number of tragedies due to the "scoop" concerning the bank. Awakened by a cheer from the directors' room, he learns that enough currency has been brought into the building to save the bank if there is no publicity in the matter; so he volunteers to go to the newspaper office and suppress the news. He appeals to the managing editor to "kill" the story, but he refuses and the two men quarrel. Field, the editor, is seized with a fit and becomes unconscious. Garfield sees an opportunity. Pretending to be the managing editor, he picks up the telephone and orders "that story killed at once," and is obeyed. At dawn, the bank directors who have waited out all the night, hear the good news that the bank is saved. Then Garfield stumbles in and drops into a chair, sobbing: "I have betrayed my profession," but Mildred enters and consoles him.

THE SPEEDWAY OF DESPAIR (March 11).—Geo. Seymour attempts to keep up the pace of a large city and is lured into speculation. He is employed as a confidential clerk by John Cable, and as his habits are constantly calling for money, he soon finds himself dangerously involved, having appropriated small amounts from time to time from his employer. Seeking to escape, he happens to think of Jim Predmore, a boyhood friend, to whom he writes a letter offering a position in the same office, thinking that he may transfer some of his own peculations to the shoulders of his friend. Jim, joyous over the prospect of seeing a big city, leaves his fond mother and his sweetheart, Kitty Blair, and goes to the city. He soon gets busy in the big office, and, going conscientiously to work over day dooks and ledgers, soon finds figures which arouse his suspicion; but George, hiding his own guilt, finally explains the matter to Jim's satisfaction. Panic-stricken, George observes he must get busy at once if he wishes to save his own precious neck. He goes back to the office after nightfall, "doctors" Jim's ledger so that suspicion will rest upon him, and takes more money from the cash box. The next morning Jim comes in a few moments late and finds the office in commotion. George accuses Jim in a strong scene, and later, unable to exonerate himself, is arrested on circumstantial evidence and is sentenced to serve ten years.

During this interim, the perfidious friend, George Seymour, has accumulated wealth, married, and is living at home with his wife and four-year-old daughter. George, returning after eight years, broken in spirit, takes to the speedway of despair, and drifts a derelict among the chief drinking houses. He finally works himself into a great desire to kill Seymour. The latter's daughter has an unfortunate habit of sleep-walking. One night she unlatches the French window and walks out into the garden just as Jim, who has crawled up with his gun in hand on his deadly mission, encounters her. He is startled to see the little, white-gowned figure walk out into the moonlight in her bare feet. He is on his knees, and the child, in a drowsy wonder, places her arms about his neck. Kitty, his old sweetheart, who has come from the country to take charge of the little girl, recognizes the man and brings him immediately to a sense of his better self. He escapes from the premediated murder, and throwing aside dead hope, re-kindles the fires and better desires and takes up the future by Kitty's side.

KID PINK AND THE MAHARAJAH (March 12).—A serio-comic tale shows wherein the East and the West strangely mingle despite Kipling's declaration that: "Never the twain shall meet." Sim Bowie, a pompous sheriff of a frontier county, is anxious to capture Kid Pink, a notorious outlaw who has recently despoiled the Silver Gulch Bank. Sim, however, is fonder of sitting in a swivel chair, spitting at a mark, and swapping yarns with the boys than he is of risking his well-groomed hide in the haunts of the outlaws. He posts a notice of a thousand dollar reward for Kid, dead or alive. About this time Kid sends in a written taunt to the sheriff and his deputies, defying him to take him. This does not move Sim, but the deputies take to the trail. They follow Kid where he has fallen over a bluff and been killed.

In the interim, the stage arrives in town, bearing a passenger, Jaswant Singe, an East Indian. Sim entertains the visitor in his office in great state. They take copious libations of fusel-oil and the Hindu launches forth into a description of the grandeurs of the land in which he is a Maharajah, and gives Sim a book on Reincarnation. Sim, as thoroughly loaded with this information as he is with whiskey, falls asleep and dreams that he has died and his soul has been transmigrated into somebody in that far land. In his

ELIZABETH'S PRAYER (March 13).—Henry Ashton is very happy with his wife, Margaret, and his little daughter, Elizabeth, until one day the former is called to her home on account of the illness of her mother, and takes the child with her. This illness in lingering, so that the wife is detained longer than she expected. The husband is irritated over the situation and writes of his loneliness, blaming his mother-in-law for their situation. While he is trying to "make the time fly," he goes to a cafe, where he meets Hilda Crosby, and falls under her spell.

When the wife and child finally return, they find the husband and father much changed. The child, who seems to be a half cousin to Willie Getit, goes to Ashton's office and observes him embracing the actress. She tells her mother of this, who goes there and confirms the rumor through her own sight, and retreats broken-hearted, dropping her bag in the outer office. The bag contains a letter from Henry to Hilda, which has been intercepted. Henry finds the bag and then conscience-stricken, realizes that his wife has found him out. That night, Margaret, in her despairing sorrow, prepares to take poison. Little Elizabeth, missing her mother from the bed, and perturbed over her mournful aspect of late, kneels and prays God to make mamma happy again. The mother in the next room, with the poison to her lips, hears the childish petition and hesitates at the rash act she is about to commit. At this moment the father, who has been tortured by his conscience, steps in to look again upon the mother and child and witnesses the pathetic scene. There is a complete change of heart, he gathers the mother and child in his arms, and the family are reunited to begin life again.

THE UP-HILL CLIMB (Special—2 parts—Feb. 16).—Frank Cameron suddenly concludes to leave the passé environment of the East, and goes to Montana to become a cow puncher. In the little town of Sunset, he becomes known as the champion scrapper of the district.

Josephine Thompson is a protege—even more—a companion of Mrs. Cameron, in the Far East. The latter, falling seriously ill, and loving her charge, conceives an idea that if Josephine could find and marry Frank, it would rehabilitate and make a man of him. She makes this as a part of her inheritance, in fact, makes her will in favor of her son only on condition that he marry Josephine. After considerable correspondence through detectives and lawyers, Josephine locates Frank Cameron in the town of Sunset. She happens to arrive there one day when Frank is drunk. Josephine, however, is a determined young woman of business. She secures a license, finds a parson, and sends a message to Frank to meet her at once. Frank, drunk as he is, can stand; but does not realize exactly what is going on. So he allows himself to be married to the apparent stranger.

Josephine, having accomplished her disagreeable legal duties, leaves on the next train to visit relatives who own the Mason ranch in the same state. Frank, awakening the next morning from his jag, in a repentant mood, registers a great vow never to touch liquor again. In his sober senses, he opens a letter, and singularly enough finds an offer to become foreman of the Mason ranch. He mounts his broncho and starts for the Mason ranch.

Of course, the Mason ranch happens to be the very place where Josephine is the guest of honor. She immediately recognizes the handsome Frank Cameron, but he does not know her. Gradually the man comes to himself, and the woman finds she is falling in love with him despite herself. Through the treacherous deviltry of Dick Felton, who has conceived a wild admiration for Josephine and who knows Frank's weakness for liquor, the latter is mercilessly tempted to fall from grace and break his pledge. The variations of this temptation are numerous and interesting, and vividly show the struggle of the strong man against a besetting weakness. The girl is so interested, that she tries to lend a hand; but he, in his pride, hardens his heart and stubbornly concludes to keep up the contest alone with himself.

In the interim, he has fallen in love with Josephine, but knowing that he is already a married man, he is too much of a gentleman to reveal his true feelings, preferring to suffer his double discomfort in solitude. Between the love of liquor and the love of a good woman, he has a terrible trial. Finally, the great awakening comes about through a clever accident. Josephine visits Frank in his cabin, where he has undergone several stages of martyrdom. A friend happens in at the same time who was a witness to their marriage. Josephine, crestfallen, flees, but the friend remains to tell Frank Cameron of his fortune in winning this girl. This knowledge dispels all the dark clouds that hang upon the horizon of his misspent life, and he soon clasps Josephine in his arms.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN, No. 5—A Colonel in Chains (Feb. 23).—With Kathlyn's revelations of herself as a slave, Prince Umballah, her purchaser, has her imprisoned in the dungeon of the royal palace. There she finds her father, whom she was led to believe had been dead. That worthy gentleman, enraged, tries with his bare hands to end the life of the hateful Umballah, who intrudes upon their presence, but is dragged away by his retainers. This is brought about when Umballah informs Kathlyn that she is to be the favorite of his harem. This so infuriates Col. Hare that he is about to strangle the dusky Prince, when Kathlyn implores him not to stain his hands with blood. Umballah staggers to his feet, furious with rage, leaves the place vowing vengeance, promising to return with the executioner to publicly flog his prisoner. As he staggers up the steps in the corridor of the palace, he encounters Bruce, the American hunter, who has found his way into that labyrinth in search of Kathlyn. Umballah suspicions him, questions him and then orders him taken from the palace. In the throne-room Umballah finds his Councillors, makes his complaint, and it is agreed that Col. Hare must suffer for tampering with his sacred person.

A big baboon escapes from confinement and in prying about perches upon the prison window in the very cell in which Kathlyn and her father are confined. This alert young woman conceives the idea of communicating with the outer world, sending by it a message to its keeper so that Ahmed will get it and further their plans for escape. She rips the insole from her shoe, and writes with the Colonel's indelible pencil, "In the palace prison. Help.—Kathlyn." She ties this about the neck of the monkey and then it is captured by Ahmed, who, seeing the message, at once takes it to Bruce. The resourceful American consults with Ramabai, and they conclude to drive an elephant up to the prison window and pull out the bars. This is done, and so much of the masonry comes free that Kathlyn easily escapes through the opening; but Col. Hare, securely chained to the pillar in his prison, is unable to get away. He tells his daughter to leave, as fortune will free him; so she reluctantly hurries away to the Hare bungalow in the jungles of Allaha, as the scene dims.

Kathlyn's safety having been secured, she immediately begins planning how to release her father. The first move in this project is to secure Umballah by strategy. They accomplish this with the aid of the fascinating Pundita, who pretends to have turned against Kathlyn and assumes to wish to effect her capture. Umballah, disarmed by rage, immediately starts out in quest of his prey. On arriving at the bungalow, he rushes into the room, but suddenly finds the door barred behind him by Kathlyn, who is holding a leopard in leash. Thus they take advantage of his fear, and he is forced to sign a release for Col. Hare from the palace prison. Having secured this important document, Bruce, Kathlyn and Pundita, leaving Umballah guarded by the leopard, rush to their elephant with their impedimenta and start to a rendezvous in the jungle, where they are to meet Col. Hare, who is to come when released through the medium of Umballah's message.

Umballah, having finally affected his escape with great difficulty, returns to the palace—but too late. The messenger has filed his order, the prisoner has been released, and is well on his way toward the coast. The vengeful Parsee prince, however, is not to be so easily outwitted, and starts his retainers on dromedaries to intercept the flight of the Americans. Umballah, coming up with the rear of the procession, takes a long distance shot and wounds Kathlyn.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN, No. 6—Three Bags of Silver (Mar. 9).—The chance-shot fired by the villainous but keen-sighted Umballah, makes a bone-bruise upon the fair arm of Kathlyn. This, however, does not stop her flight, or militate against the escape of herself, her daring companion, Bruce, and her father, Col. Hare, who escaped from prison through the machinations of the clever Pundita and met them at the appointed rendezvous before the vengeful Prince and his creatures started in pursuit. Fortunately, the escaping party is accompanied by Ramabai and his faithful wife, Pundita, who are now Kathlyn's staunchest friends and of incalculable assistance in every emergency.

Presently they emerge from the jungle and see far out on the plains the white towers and shining minarets standing silhouetted against the sky—Alhabad, the walled city of the desert. They approach the town and are received by sentinels at the gates and are conducted into the presence of the Rajah. This functionary, in addition to being commander of the city, has a more important office as keeper of the Sacred White Elephant, which is frequently sent on pilgrimages to nearby

"The Money God"

IN FIVE REELS

State Rights Now Selling U.S., Canada and Panama

A dramatic presentation of the question

"Do Riches Bring Happiness?"

A problem play of unusual interest, showing how death, misfortune and disaster followed a man's swollen and tainted wealth. From a life of poverty he is given an opportunity to acquire a foothold in the financial world. His desire for wealth is insatiable, and he sacrifices everything a man should prize—his family, friends, self-respect—on the altar of the MONEY GOD.

The Greatest Fire Scene Ever Shown in a Film

The great fire on board the ocean liner is unquestionably the greatest spectacle ever produced before the camera. It shows the hold of a colossal ship, with its rows of boilers, and men stripped to the waist, firing. Then comes the crash—the waters rush in—the boilers explode. The ensuing scenes are beyond description as men plunge into the maelstrom of death to rescue their fellows, while on deck the officers battle with the frenzied passengers.

A Sensible Film for Intelligent People

The public has been satiated with tawdry sensationalism. "The Money God" presents the mooted question, "Do riches bring happiness?" in a forceful manner, giving an audience not only a dramatic treat in the superb acting of the characters and satisfying the demand of those who require sensationalism, but also appeals to the thinking minds. It will create much comment and discussion. It is a different film, dealing with a serious subject, and will live forever in the memories of those seeing it.

cities to be worshipped by the natives. It is one of the precious possessions of the place—hence the walled city, and many savage guardians that look after its chiefest treasure.

The Sacred Elephant is presumably returning from a visitation where it has been the guest of honor, when a fierce band of brigands that inhabit the hills lying along the desert, decide to capture it and convey it to a rival Maharajah across the distant desert. Fortunately, the Sacred charge arrives within the walled city before the brigands attain its possession. They, however, are resourceful and have other means at their command, as they know the attendants of the Elephant are weary of their duties and will take to their favorite dissipation of opium smoking. The brigands outside the walls await their opportunity and when it comes they knock down and bind the guards at the gate, enter the Rajah's premises and carry away the precious animated object of worship.

About this time Kathlyn and her entourage arrive in the city and the next morning are informed by the commotion of the great loss. Bruce, through Ramabai, is put in touch with the situation; likewise, Kathlyn, and they immediately offer assistance if reciprocal aid is given in the form of a military convoy, which is readily granted. Kathlyn is rushed out into the desert on the back of a wild camel, and from this gazeboo sweeps the horizon with her binoculars. Following her is a large train led by Bruce, together with the savage soldiery picturesque in their Oriental accoutrements. Cleverly disposing the force, Kathlyn and a few of her followers go forward while the troops are concealed. They meet the brigands and pretend to be friendly, giving them quantities of opium as peace offerings. The brigands are disarmed by this kindness and soon stupified into security through the influence of the narcotic. As they are helpless, it is a comparatively easy matter to get the Sacred Elephant. On their way back to the walled city, they meet Umballah, who has been reinforced for the pursuit; but, his soldiers, in superstitious fear, bow before the Sacred Elephant, so that Kathlyn and her party are allowed to proceed on their way. It is some time before Umballah, furious over the attitude of his men, rallies them and induces them to move forward. When they arrive at the gates of the walled city, they are denied entrance by the soldiers of the Rajah, and Umballah returns sullenly to Allaha in defeat.

The following day Kathlyn and her party again start on their way to the Coast, and, strangely enough, are captured by the self-same band of brigands from whom they secured the animated sacred symbol. Kathlyn, her father and Bruce are tied to a tiger cart of the brigands. The chief, searching Col. Hare, finds his medal and knows at once that he has captured the White King. Thereupon he sends a messengar forward to Allaha, demanding as a ransom from Umballah, three bags of silver. A few days later Umballah arrives in haste with his silver, but asks only for Col. Hare, as a prisoner, earnestly requesting that Bruce and Kathlyn be fed to the tigers. (To be continued.)

THE TRAGEDY OF AMBITION (Mar. 2).—Madge O'Mara supported a semi-invalid mother by working as a cashier in Portuguese Joe's chop-house. Reginald Van Dorn, returning from college, goes "slumming" with some fashionable associates, and happens into the chop-house where Madge O'Mara is the chiefest ornament. He is interested in sociology, and finds in this girl a most fascinating and charming study. He soon discovers her fine qualities, and becomes attracted to her by something more than platonic friendship; but as an honorable man, makes honorable advance. The repeated visits of this handsome youth incurs the hatred of Portuguese Joe. He and his confederates plot to do away with Reginald.

In the meantime, he has affronted Madge, but her poverty compels her to keep in his service. This, the small-minded Portuguese believes is to be his ultimate triumph. One night he sends her out for change when he learns that Reginald is coming. Reginald arrives and is decoyed into an adjoining room—bound, gagged and prepared to have a long stay in the tide that seethes below the floor of the rickety old building. Madge returns before she is expected. The conspirators are throwing Reginald through the window into the river when she seizes a knife from one of the villains, and clenching it between her teeth, jumps into the water after the helpless victim.

She swims to the bound man, cuts the ropes that bind him, and supports him ashore. She then makes her way with him to her own modest home nearby. There she and her mother nurse him back to life. She telephones his palatial home on Riverside Drive, telling his parents where their son is. They come early next morning in their limousine, together with Corine Rower, Reginald's fiancee. This brings about a crashing contrast between Madge in her plain raiment and her lowly surroundings, and the fashionable woman of money and her intolerant social parasite Corine. Instead of thanking the young girl for the great work in saving their son's life, the pompous old father threatens to disinherit him unless he turns his back upon the chop-house cashier, forever, while the mother is lofty beyond compare, and the priggish young woman snippy to a degree. They leave poor little Madge with her delicate mother in a condition of mind that is pitiful. She, however, believes that Reginald has true manhood and will return; instead, however, comes a letter, enclosing a check from his father, for her kindness in saving his life. Tearing the check and her wedding garments simultaneously into bits, she vows to kill the man if she ever again comes face to face with him, no matter when or where.

Three years pass quickly. Madge has seemingly forgotten her troubles, and becomes skilled as a trained nurse. In the interim, Reginald has married and been desperately unhappy, so that when he meets with a terrible accident, he feels that death would be truly welcome. He is carried to his own home unconscious, and the doctor, after applying first aids to the injured, telephones for a nurse. Singularly enough, Madge O'Mara is sent in response to the hurried call. At first, owing to the bandages, she does not recognize the patient. Then all at once it dawns upon her. The bitterness of the passing years come up to her heart. Then as he tosses in delirium she hears her own name, hears the story again of his great love, of his disappointment, and the darkness of his own life. Instead of administering the death drop, she swiftly and tenderly soothes the suffering one who has been in reality hers—at least now is for the rest of the night. Only the dawn ends for her that perfect possession which is the ultimate happiness of the woman who loves. This can be met when it comes. Tonight is tonight, and it is in her hands to give him surcease from pain—ease to the man she loves. Even the great social rift that swallowed up their love has been bridged as she kneels in happiness by his side, and he holds her calm, strong hand in perfect peace.

The Colosseum in Films
These motion pictures are the first in a gala series of truly educational films entitled
THE GLORIES OF ROME
The pictures were made with special permission of the Italian Government and according to instructions of W. Stephen Bush of The Moving Picture World, who was in Rome at the time. The Vero Educational Society has purchased the negative.
Every point of interest in the immortal edifice is covered in a most entertaining way, bringing back memories of the wonderful days when 80,000 spectators looked down upon the struggles in the arena.
There are four divisions:
I. The Exterior and Entrances, together with views of Rome from different stories of the Colosseum.
II. The Lower Floor and the Arena.
III. The Stories and Lodges.
IV. What was hidden beneath the Arena.
The total length of the pictures is three thousand feet. Title and all printed matter have been prepared by Mr. Bush. The titles are full and exact, and a lecture goes with certain parts of the film. The photography is of a high standard, and portions of the films are suitably tinted. For all further information address

READ THIS CONFESSION:

"THE GREAT LEAP," which was produced under the direction of W. Christy Cabanne and supervision of D. W. Griffith, and which is undoubtedly one of their greatest works both in dramatic intensity and photographic excellence, was not intended for a release at all. It was produced as a special offering, to be shown at a Broadway theatre in New York City and then to go on a tour of regular dramatic houses. But it slipped out by mistake one day and now it is yours if you will pay the price, even though it has already been booked for Weber's Theatre, Broadway, New York City, and will positively be offered at that playhouse during the month of March.

St. Louis, Mo.—Half a thousand men out of work march through the streets to the City Hall, led by James Eads Howe, sometimes called "the millionaire hobo."

Oakland, Cal.—Many thousand tons of rock are wrenched by dynamite from the hills to fill in the Key Route over the bay to the Exposition grounds. Here is shown the method of dynamiting the rock.

New York City.—Woman's emancipation from her bonds—a suffragist pantomime is symbolized by Florence Fleming Noyes before a notable gathering of suffragist leaders at the Biltmore, New York's newest big hotel.

San Francisco, Cal.—Up from the ground are rising the magnificent buildings of the world's playground at the Panama Pacific Exposition. Here is shown the Horticultural Building, nearing completion.

St. Louis, Mo.—If boys want to fight, why shouldn't they? The police and school authorities here let 300 youngsters satisfy that lust for battle and fight it out with snowballs.

Berlin, Germany.—Ice yachting, sailing in these Berlin finds outdoor amusement during the cold days of her unusually severe winter.

Palm Beach, Fla.—Ice and snow have no place here. While the rest of the country shivers, the fortunate children of riches bask in the sunshine, take sea baths and while away bright hours on the sand.

Seattle, Wash.—Extra! Extra! Many "dead" and "wounded" in terrific assault by the Rotary Club on a fort here. The fort is snow; the "dead" are carried from the field and soon recover.

THE HUNTING SPIDERS (March 10—Prepared by Raymond L. Ditmars, Curator of Reptiles, New York Zoological Society).—Among the spiders is shown the vicious tarantula, of South America, which kills small birds, reptiles and insects. It belongs to the group of hunting spiders that spin no web, but stalk their prey. Its lair is a tunnel of leaves bound by the creature's silk. The cocoon is nearly as large as a hen's egg and holds the spider's eggs. It is carefully guarded by the female in the shelter of rocks or heavy vegetation. It contains about 200 pearl-like eggs, which require six weeks for incubation. Frequently these poisonous spiders come north hidden in bunches of bananas. Rarely is a ship unloaded without the discovery of one or two tarantulas.

Another large tarantula inhabits Texas. It has shorter legs, a heavier body and shorter hair than the tropical species. Savage and alert, it neither courts nor avoids an attack. Another interesting spider shown is the mygales or trap door spider, of California; which dwells in the sterile regions. The doors of their burrows are covered and hinged with silk. The creature holds the door closed by hooking a claw in the silken lining.

The lycosa or wolf spider is common in the eastern part of the United States. It hides under stones in damp places and is an extremely alert and savage hunter. The cocoon of this spider is also shown. The female drags around the heavy cocoon and also carries the young for a full two weeks. The dolomedes or nursery spider is also shown. This is the interesting insect which is so often seen on bodies of fresh water. It gets its name from the "nursery" web spun over the cocoon to insure the safety of the young.

THE PICTURESQUE COAST OF CATALONIA (March 10).—Beautiful views of a little known, but extremely picturesque, seacoast.

ABIDE WITH ME (March 11).—Ralph Chalmers is the typical prodigal son to whom the father's wealth is but a demoralizing influence. A spendthrift and hail fellow well met, he is the idol of his companions, young men and women as reckless and wayward as he is himself. Meeting by chance an attractive girl coming out of church one morning, Ralph sees in her face the antithesis of what he is and feels the pangs of conscience. He meets her and is even more strongly attracted by her. Mentally he resolves to turn over a new leaf and be worthy of her. The good resolution is soon forgotten and Ralph relapses into his old habits. His fall from grace reaching Jean's ears, she refuses forgiveness.

Enraged by his son's dissipation Mr. Chalmers disowns him and turns him from the house. The young man goes from bad to worse and finally drifts into the vilest slums. One day crazed by drugs he wanders into a little mission hall and is astounded to see Jean there singing before the congregation. Her old father having died, Jean has devoted her talents to making the world better. Recognizing her old admirer she sets out to redeem him from his evil ways and by patience and the example of her own blameless life finally drags him from the depths and makes him worthy of her love.

A SPOILED LIFE (Special—2 parts—March 12).—This is a story of a brilliant man who possesses every gift save that of a normal body; he is deformed. Living in retirement he writes a play which enraptures the critics and in which the great actress, Hilda Wierum, obtains new laurels. Flushed with success she regrets the absence of the author, whose work has meant so much to her and learning that he is stopping in Capri, sends for him.

Hugo Sarden, the author, fears to accept the cordial invitation, knowing that his deformity will prove to be a serious handicap. He finally decides to visit her just once since he has found his retirement irksome because of its loneliness. When Sarden is announced the actress is filled with pleasurable anticipation, which is at once changed to distaste when she sees the little hunchback. The sensitive man sees her disapproval, feels it, and starts to go. Pitying him, she recalls him and her charms make him her instant slave.

Feeling that love is not for him, he writes her that he is going back to his exile and makes his love for her evident in every line. Mistaking her sincere pity for love she prevents his journey and when he proposes to her, accepts and marries him. Not long afterward she finds she has married in haste to repent at leisure. The leading man in her company is handsome and talented and soon makes a deep impression upon her. Sarden notices this and suffers the torments of jealousy. Sarden's newest play is produced and the author sitting alone in his box sees not the success of his drama, but has eyes for only one thing: the vivid lovemaking between his wife and the leading man. The audience looks upon it as wonderful acting, but Sarden in his heart knows that it is not art, but love.

After the matinee Sarden returns to his home and waits in vain for his wife. She is in her dressing-room accepting the advances of her lover and Sarden instinctively knows this. Going to the theater he conceals himself in the entrance and waits for the thief of his wife's affections. Finally the man appears and Sarden from his concealment aims a revolver at the unconscious victim's back. But his conscience triumphs and he permits his rival to walk from the theater unscathed. For himself remains only his lonely walk home and then in his library he visits upon himself the death he had intended for the other.

AGAINST HEAVY ODDS (Special—2 parts—March 14).—Bob Melville, having struck pay dirt in his mine, leaves for the East to raise money to work it. He takes with him a bag of gold obtained from the mine and the gold excites the cupidity of several hard characters among his Mexican laborers. Jose, his faithful servant, a poor ignorant peon, but loyal to the core, hears a plot to waylay Melville and rob him of his gold and at once starts to head off the mail coach which is bearing his employer to the nearest railroad station. He reaches it in the nick of time and persuades Bob to leave it and escape with him to the bush. The bandits arriving a few moments later find their prey has flown and at once start to follow the trail of the mines. Catching a glimpse of Bob they fire and wound him. The faithful Jose aids him as best he can, but finding the pursuit uncomfortably close adopts the subterfuge of hiding the wounded man in the bushes while he, having put on Bob's boots, keeps on his way. Before long he is captured and the enraged bandits tie him to a tree and prepare to kill him. At this juncture Ferrera, a wealthy Spanish landowner, comes upon the scene and rescues him.

A year later Melville, now wealthy from the income of his mine, revisits old scene sand meets the Ferreras. He finds to his surprise that Jose has become the gardener of his new friends. He does not know, however, that his old servant has won the love of the fair Carmen. Spurred by his love, Jose leaves the hacienda to secure for himself an education that will make him more worthy of Carmen.

Two years later by diligently applying himself to his duties and by original research Jose discovers a new process for hardening steel and offers it to a large steel company. Not long after he receives a check for a large sum from them. He realizes that at least he can hope to secure the hand of Carmen and at once carries the news of his success to Carmen in person. In the meantime Bob has proposed to Carmen and been rejected. However, when he learns that Jose has been more successful than he, burying his own feelings he proves himself a true friend and gives the happy young couple not only a handsome present, but his sincere congratulations as well.

VITAGRAPH.

AN OFFICER AND A GENTLEMAN (March 14).—A synopsis of this special two-part military drama can be found on page 1142 of our last week's issue—February 28. This picture was originally scheduled by the Vitagraph Company to be released on March 7, but just before the issue for the 28th went to press we were informed by the manufacturers that they have decided to substitute in its place "The Mischief Maker," a two-part drama, a story of which is published in this issue. It was then too late to change the story and the only corrections that were made were those in the calendar of Licensed Releases and Licensed Release Dates. Exhibitors will please observe this.

THE FLAMING DIAGRAM (2 parts—March 9).—Erickson, an inventor of high explosives, manufactures a compound for the U. S Government, but will not sell the secret of its ingredients, as he wishes his family (which consists of a son and daughter) to still benefit by his formula in case of his death. The daughter, Lillian, is in love with one of the clerks in the War Department, who is in reality a foreign spy. Another country tries to buy the explosive, but Erickson's patriotism will not permit him to sell it. To prevent the secret from perishing with him at his death, he starts to write out the formula, but Lillian's sweetheart, Brack, watches what he is writing. This is seen by young Erickson, who orders Brack from the house. Lillian protests until told what he had done when she, too, denounces her lover. The inventor, to safeguard himself and family in case of his death, writes out the formula in a way that only his children will be able to read it. It is placed in an envelope and sent to the War Department with the instruction that it is only opened in case of his death and in presence of his family.

Brack learns of this and at the instigation of his chief hires two cracksmen to open the safe and secure the formula. The inventor dies suddenly, and the cracksmen are interrupted in their work by a messenger sent to secure the formula. They capture the messenger and steal the envelope. Brack takes it to his superior and when the latter opens it it is found to contain nothing but a diagram of some bottles and a blank sheet of paper, with the instruction on the envelope that the key is in the desk drawer. Young Erickson, judging that they will return for the keys, lies in wait for them. He captures them just as they climb in the window. On obtaining the envelope Erickson, Jr., is as much mystified as they were for the key (which is a real metal one) has a tag on which is written "burn diagram." While he and his sister are puzzling over this, his cigarette accidentally lights the blank sheet of paper. It burns in a peculiar manner and leaves an intricate design which, when fitted over the diagram of bottles, gives them the formula.

ECLAIR.

INTO THE FOOTHILLS (2 parts—March 11).—Steve Brady, a young prospector, and his three pals search in vain for months among the foothills for a vein of gold that will make them rich. Steve, while stumbling through the underbrush one day, trips, and, in throwing out his hand to save himself, accidentally strikes a rich lode. Overjoyed at his discovery he starts for town for some supplies and on the way he meets Barker, a villainous old miner, who is starting off with his wife and beautiful daughter, Ruth, to prospect. Steve tells him of the find, Barker plies him with whiskey until he is drunk and then strikes him over the head with the empty bottle. He is about to kill Steve, but his wife interferes only to be brutally beaten, and he desists only when his daughter threatens to shoot him. Steve gains his senses and staggers away. Barker sends a shot after him, wounding him in the arm. Barker and his family then move on and he accidentally stumbles across Steve's shack. Fearing the wrath of the rangers he deserts Ruth and her mother and rides off. Meanwhile the wounded man's burro arrives in camp and the startled partners find bloodstains on the blanket. Seeing the bag of rich ore they surmise what has happened and one of them starts off in search of Steve.

Ruth accidentally stumbles across the rich vein of gold which Steve unearthed and rushes back to tell her mother, only to find that she is dying from the effects of her father's blows. Realizing how little use the gold is to her now, Ruth casts it out of the window and a prowling Mexican seeing it strike the ground grabs it and rushes off to tell his companions. The mother dies and Ruth is alone in the shack. The Mexicans on hearing their companion's story decide to invade the shack and secure the rest of the gold. Meanwhile Steve's partners carry him back to camp and after examining his wounds, his pals start off to find Barker. The Mexicans ride over to the shack and by the way meet Barker. Believing he is pursued he opens fire upon them, but they kill him. Steve's partners arrive at his shack and entering [illegible] hear the story of the assault and her mother's death. While they are talking the Mexicans surround the house and open fire. The white [illegible] to fight and while Ruth loads the guns they return shot for shot. Finding themselves repulsed, the drunken invaders set fire to the cabin. Rather than fall into the hands of the Mexicans the two men decide to kill each other and the girl, and are sitting with the guns placed against each other's temples when a troop of rangers, who have been crossing the plains, see the fire and ride over. They drive away the plunderers, capturing several of them. Ruth and the partners return to Steve and to bury her mother—and it is decided to make the girl an equal partner in the mine which Steve discovered.

THE TWIN'S DOUBLE (Three parts—March 10).—Grace, the crook, is acquitted after Kelly, the detective, has brought all his machinery to bear to convict her. In the dive which she inhabits she finds under the influence of opium, Nell, a society woman who is almost her double. In Nell's purse Grace finds a note telling of the costume that she (Nell) is going to wear at a fashionable masquerade that night. Grace goes to the masquerade as Nell and there meets Nell's twin sister, Jo, and Kelly, the detective. Neither suspects that she is not Nell.

At the height of the ball Grace steals a pearl necklace from a society leader. The ballroom becomes a scene of confusion, and to complicate matters, Nell puts in an appearance. With the twin sisters and Grace in the same room the detective sees that he has been tricked. He is about to arrest Grace when the woman crook makes a clever escape. He traces her to the dive and comes face to face with her. Grace shows him Nell, his sweetheart, sleeping off the effect of the drug. In rapid succession Grace beats the detective three times and again escapes. The detective again locates Grace in a cafe. After closing every avenue of escape he goes to her and presents her with a jewel box. The woman opens it to see the present. It contains a pair of handcuffs. She is taken. The story ends when Nell promises the detective to forever forsake the drug of so many sorrows.

THE HONEYMOONERS (2 parts—March 13).—Ronald Stuart and Florence Balir, both young and wealthy, fall in love and marry. They each had a serious flirtation prior to their marriage. They go to a resort hotel for their honeymoon and while there each meets their former sweetheart, Alice James and Tom Morton, who are also on their honeymoon. They part here with profuse invitations to each other to visit them upon their return home. Here is where complications set in: for Flo is a lover of music, while Ronald is fond of card playing, and with the other couple the situation is reversed. Alice cares for cards, while Tom is musically inclined. When Ronald asks Flo to play cards, she can find no enthusiasm for the game, and insists on his hearing her play. Ronald is peeved: they quarrel and he leaves the house and vists Morton, where a similar quarrel has taken place. Tom leaves the house to visit the Stuarts. Ronald indulges in a card game with Alice, while Flo and Tom amuse themselves at the piano. This causes a volcano of jealousy; there is a quarrel. Flo leaves for Reno and obtains a divorce; but they are both still in love with each other. On the anniversary of their wedding each decides to go to the resort hotel and spend a few days in the bridal suite. They each telegraph to have the suite reserved. The hotel clerk thinks they are still man and wife.

Flo arrives first and is installed in the bridal suite. Ronald arrives later. Ronald goes up to the suite. Explanations follow, and each finds the other guiltless of flirting and agree to forgive. They are divorced and in a quandary. Ronald remembers a clergyman he saw dozing in the lobby and enlists his services. Flo dresses; Ronald brings the clergyman up to the rooms and the marital knot is re-tied, with the hotel clerk and the head porter as witnesses.

THE IMPOSTOR (March 5).—Bob Marks is an impostor, and fakes blindness as an excuse to beg. His most profitable stand is at the entrance of a church. The parson suspects he is a fraud and orders him away. Marks goes home and finds in the squalid rooms next to his that his neighbor, Mrs. Haze, is seriously ill, and attended only by her little daughter, Runa. Marks at the woman's request hastily goes for a parson and a doctor. When he arrives at the parson's house the servant will not admit him, so he writes a short note, saying that the dying woman wishes to see the parson and gives it to the servant to deliver. At the same time the parson receives a letter from one of his rich parishioners, stating that her father would probably contribute to his foreign mission fund if he would call at the house at once. Parson ponders over the two letters—the poor he knows he has always with him, but the chance to get a contribution for the fund does not come every day, so decides to visit the rich parishioner.

Meantime Marks brings the doctor to the poor woman, and at the doctor's request Marks hurries to the nearest drugstore to get a prescription filled. The parson is disappointed when he arrives at the rich parishioner's house and discovers that the parishioner is very ill and cannot attend to him. He then decides to visit the poor woman. As he passes the drug store he sees and recognizes Marks, who has now discarded all pretense to blindness. He informs a policeman and they pursue Marks. When Marks gets back with the medicine the poor woman is dead. He promises the doctor that he will quit his dishonest method of making a living and take care of the little orphan. As the doctor looks to see that the truth is in his eyes he discovers that Marks has simulated blindness for so long that his eyes are actually in danger. He is applying a remedy when the parson and police enter. They see the doctor attending his eyes and go away thinking that the parson was mistaken.

THE MEXICAN'S LAST RAID (March 11).—An early Southwestern drama set at a time when Mexican bandits held forth in mountain strongholds and hurled defiance at gentlemen and miners alike. Bill, a young miner, loves a storekeeper's daughter despite the objections to the match by the girl's parent. When the irate father leaves the store for the town, the girl is to fire two shots, which shall be a signal for Bill to come to her. Before these plans are consummated, however, two Mexican bandits take the father captive. The girl escapes and one of the bandits fires two shots after her.

At his diggings, Bill hears the shots and thinks it is the girl signaling. Bill reaches the store in time to save the father and stop the robbery. The father still discourages Bill's advances toward his daughter. Shortly after this, another member of the Mexican band finds the daughter in the store alone and kidnaps her. The father offers Bill the girl in marriage if he will save her. Bill rides into the Mexicans' camp and rescues the girl.

WHAT A BABY DID (March 14).—Eddie sees her trim figure, looks into her smiling brown eyes and forthwith realizes that he has met his Waterloo. He vows never to rest more until she promises to be his. However, the next time he spies her, to his chagrin, he observes that she is wheeling a small baby. Life looks black to Eddie. She stops at the door of a department store. He is at her side in an instant. She trusts him and leaves the baby in his care. The baby cries. He takes it in his arms and goes in search of the girl. The girl returns and misses the child.

He checks the baby in the store nursery. When he ultimately finds the young lady, he explains and offers to get the baby. Instead of giving him the original baby, the nurse gives him a colored child. He covers the face of the black baby and gives it to the young lady—then runs. She discovers the mistake and goes into hysterics. After a hot chase the young man is captured. The mis-

UNIVERSAL IKE.

ALKALI IKE'S WOOING (March 10).—"They died for love. Locked in each other's arms, they capsized the boat and sank beneath the surface of the dismal waters without a murmur." Thus the romantic Mary reads and her youthful imagination is first with the noble sentiment. Mary loves Universal Ike, but the solemn thought occurs to her: "Would he die for me; would he sacrifice himself at the altar of our divine love?" She decides to put him to the test. She will invite him to take her boating and encourage him to propose—then she will write her answer upon a card and throw it into the lake. Will he jump into the treacherous water after it?

Mary confides her plan to her sister and the sister, fearing for Ike's life, tells him how his love is to be tested. Ike is a brave man and he determines to prove himself worthy of his sweetheart's confidence. But that there may be no hitch in the matter, he first secures a life-preserver and places it under his vest. The lovers go boating and Mary tests Alkali's love. However, when the devoted Ike jumps from the boat, it is overbalanced and Mary likewise falls into the water.

In the meantime Mary's sister has divulged the whole affair to her parents and all rush to the lake to save Ike. They rescue the lovers from the water. Mary discovers the life-preserver around Alkali and her fair dream of happiness is shattered. At the discovery of the imposition, Mary's father picks Ike up and throws him into the water. Ike sinks from view and those gathered sadly contemplate the ever-increasing circles upon the water.

THE HEART OF THE HILLS (2 parts—March 12).—Two brothers live together in the Kentucky mountains. Wally, the younger, is a wood-cutter, while Phil is a cripple. The brothers receive word from a city physician that Phil can recover from his infirmity only by means of an operation which will cost $800. The amount, however, is far larger than they ever expect to own at one time. In the meantime, Nan Leslie, of the U. S. Revenue Service, is detailed to go into the mountain districts of Kentucky and get evidence against a gang of moonshiners. Nan meets Wally and Phil, neither of whom suspect her identity. Nan and Wally soon learn to love each other.

When it becomes apparent that Phil must undergo an expensive operation or remain a cripple for the rest of his days, he joins the moonshiners, in making her investigations. Nan learns that Wally is one of the gang. The moonshiners discover that Nan is a revenue agent and take her prisoner. Wally divides the money he has saved for Phil's operation among the moonshiners with the understanding that he alone shall deal with the woman. When he and Nan are alone he explains to her why he became a moonshiner. She softens, renounces the government service to wed Wally and together they go out to honestly earn the money for Phil's operation.

THE SENATOR'S BILL (March 15).—State Senator Ludlowe introduces a bill in the Senate prohibiting capital punishment. That night as he goes home he remembers that it is his daughter's birthday. While he is purchasing a costly jewel as a present for his daughter, a crook is watching him through the window of the jewelry store. That night the father hears a suspicious sound and hides himself to await developments. The crook enters the room, lays his revolver upon the table and approaches the safe. The senator holds the crook at bay with his own revolver. He is about to turn the housebreaker over to the police when he remembers the charity to criminals he recommends in his bill. He liberates the crook with admonitions to lead a better life.

Left alone, the senator becomes drowsy and falls asleep in his chair. He dreams that the crook returns and re-enters his house, still bent upon stealing the jewel. In the dream he sees the crook shoot and kill his daughter, and later he sees the crook arrested. He awakens and begins studying over his bill to prohibit capital punishment. He is convinced that after his charitable action in liberating the burglar, had he returned and killed his daughter, as he dreamed, he would have been deserving of capital punishment. In the senate chamber he causes a sensation by withdrawing his bill without explanation.

BIMBERG'S LOVE AFFAIR (March 10).—Pretty Rose Smiley visits her maiden aunt and gives her a photo of herself. Herman Bimberg, the owner of a delicatessen store, inserts an ad in the newspaper for a wife. Rose's aunt reads the ad and answers same. Rose inserts her photo in it, unknown to her aunt. Bimberg gets the letter, which he shows to his nephew, Oscar. Oscar, copying the address, decides to visit. He gets there first, meets Rose, proposes and is accepted. Bimberg arrives and the old maid greets him. He fails to understand the change in her appearance. Bimberg tries to escape, but the old maid chases him through the street with a gun and after capturing him, forces him to marry her.

BALDY BELMONT BREAKS OUT (March 10).—Baldy escapes from jail. He meets a farmer and makes him change clothes with him. The farmer's wife sees this. Two guards come up and try to arrest the farmer. The woman explains their mistake. Baldy is again captured. Finally he trips the guards and pushes them down a hill. He comes across a scarecrow. He changes places with the scarecrow. The guards come up and Baldy takes turns hitting first one and then the other. They run. Baldy puts the convict garb on the scarecrow. The guards return and tackle the scarecrow. Baldy is finally captured again, this time to stay in jail for good.

KELLY'S GHOST (March 15).—The boarders in Mrs. Hagan's boarding house hold a spiritualistic seance. Keene, of the vaudeville team of Kelly and Keene, who are roomers in the house, decides to have some fun with the boarders. By the use of a pair of castanats, he manipulates the sound of spirit rapping.

Meanwhile Kelly, who is dying for a drink, goes into the German boarder's room and takes a case of bottled beer. He empties the beer and fills the bottles with water. He gets drunk and falls on the floor in a stupor. Keene returns to his room and finds the beer. His fellow boarders come into the room and are convinced of poor Kelly's demise. Keene takes up a collection to provide a burial fund. He goes out for an undertaker. The undertaker arrives with a chest full of ice. They put Kelly in the ice chest. Kelly recovers and rushes out. He enters the parlor and the boarders, convinced that they see a ghost, rush from the house. Keene, meanwhile, gets drunk on the collection fund. He returns home and puts him in the ice chest. The undertakers find they have the wrong man.

THE COLONEL OF THE MUTTS (March 12).—Colonel Pretzel, proprietor of the Cuckooville County Nutt Factory, is notified by the county officials that unless his institution does more business they will abolish it. Igo Gettem, dealer in second-hand tombstones, is also discouraged over his business. Moreover, his daughter, Molly, persists in attempting to elope with her rube sweetheart. Gettem sees Pretzel trying to commit suicide, and stops him in the hope that he will be able to sell him a tombstone. Pretzel tells of his Nutt factory and this gives Gettem an idea. He proposes that Pretzel shall pay him a stipulated price for every nutt he can bring him, a proposition that Pretzel gladly agrees to.

Gettem's first victim is his daughter's sweetheart, and the same day he lands the village minister. Colonel Pretzel meets Molly and falls in love with her, but when she snubs him he orders his attendant to take her to the asylum, and there she meets her lover. Gettem brings a wagon load of people to the asylum. As he and Pretzel are dickering over terms in the office they see Molly and her lover outside being married by the minister. They start for the door, only to find that the nutts, under the command of Napoleon, have mutinied and surrounded the office.

HIS YOUNGER BROTHER (March 14).—Joe leaves on a trip to the mining country while Willis, his friend, promises to care for Edythe, Joe's girl, during their absence. His younger brother, Arthur, meets Edythe and becomes infatuated. Bearing his promise in mind, Willis endeavors to cure him. He agrees to try out a plan that Ethel suggests. Willis makes violent love to Edythe and Arthur, seeing them, is disgusted with the inconsistency of women.

Discouraged, Joe leaves the mining country and returns home. He sees Willis with Edythe, becomes madly suspicious, and sends a note to Willis warning him that he intends to shoot on sight. Willis ignores the warning, but by the merest chance a tragedy is averted and in the end all comes out right with Arthur, the younger brother, choosing as "his girl"—his mother.

POWERS.

A MURDEROUS ELOPEMENT (March 9).—The village constable obtains the father's consent to marry Mabel, the town belle. Mabel does not love the constable, while she does love and is loved by Jimmie. The girl refuses. Jimmie is driven away and she is locked in her room. However, Jimmie is a resourceful youth. He brings her a suit of his own clothes which she takes through the window. After she has togged herself out she exits through the window to Jimmie. In doing so she falls and her nose begins bleeding. Jimmie stops the flow of blood with his handkerchief. The father sees two men escaping, finds the blood stained handkerchief and believes that his daughter has been murdered. The constable is notified and under his leadership the villagers join in the pursuit of the murderer.

Mabel and Jimmie, in the meantime, have been married. They return to her home and are set upon by the constable. However, that worthy minion of the law is put to confusion when Mabel removes her cap and reveals her tresses. The father forgives Jimmie and his daughter and the constable is the joke of the village.

THE FAITH OF TWO (March 13).—The principal character in this drama is Terio, a Bohemian and society violinist. Following his picturesque life he falls in love with Ann, the daughter of a poor family. His mother disinherits him. As they pack their things he runs across Ann's bridal veil. He holds it up for her observation and over it they pledge everlasting faith in one another. In the days that follow they are visited by extreme poverty. A false friend arouses Ann against her husband and invites her to fly with him.

Under the pressure of his poverty, Terio takes his violin to the violinist of a concert orchestra with the intention of selling it. Shortly before the concert begins, the manager of the establishment has trouble with the violinist. The musician refuses to play and Terio is invited to take his place. In the meantime, Ann comes upon the veil. She recalls her pledge to Terio and turns a cold ear to her suitor. Terio returns—a success with a contract in his pocket. Ann confesses to the temptation of the false friend and is forgiven.

CLOSED AT TEN (March 11).—Jack Bandle and Marjorie Holmes, attending the same college, are in love with each other. One evening at a dance Jack proposes and is accepted. He being so sure of Marjorie's acceptance has already procured a marriage license. Marjorie, on finding this out, refuses to marry Jack and returns his engagement ring.

Marjorie's attention is then called to the fact that it is nearly ten o'clock, which is closing time at the dormitory. She applies to Mr. Evans, Jack's rival, to escort her home and on their arrival at the dormitory find it closed. Evans secures a ladder and Marjorie climbs into what she thinks is her own room, but finds to her horror that she had entered a room in the boys' dormitory, which later proves to be Jack's. She crawls under the bed in terror. Jack comes home—discovers her. While they are planning means of escape, a professor appears on the scene. Marjorie's clever ruse enables Jack to get her away without the professor discovering her real identity. It is needless to say that Jack was repaid.

PRINCESS.

HER WAY (March 6).—Ford and Gale are great friends. Gale desires that Ford's son shall marry his daughter, May, but Jim won't listen to such an arrangement, because he likes the "white lights" and the gay cabaret life too well to tie down to any one woman. Ford plans it that if Gale could induce May to enter his household as maid and study Jim, she might find out whether the spendthrift was worth marrying, and after some coaxing the humorous situation appeals to May and she goes, swapping positions with Ford's maid. Being beautiful, she appeals to Jim's idea of woman, and the cabaret loses its charm, but when Jim proposes and offers an engagement ring, she refuses him, and plots with Ford. Jim the next morning is disconsolate when he finds she has left his life. It is not until Ford asks him to go to Gale's, as "she came from Gale's town," that Jim thinks he might run across her. He goes. Much as he dislikes to meet Gale's daughter, he feels he must on account of association, and when he turns to find the maid he made love to none other than the girl they wanted him to marry, well, they didn't have to work at all after the introduction.

THE STRONGER HAND (2 reels—March 3).—George Wilton in order to fight the trust has speculated with company money and lost; his factory is about to be closed. He gets a tip from James Roberts, a crooked broker in the employ of Robert Thorpe, the trust magnate, which tip of course goes wrong; he is ruined. Ben Martin, a discharged employee of Thorpe, robs the safe of the Wilton factory, and hides the money in the woods. Wilton and Martin are sent to prison, but each for a different crime, and they both get in the same cell. Martin is led by Wilton to study and improve himself. By reading "Monte Cristo" he is led to emulate the Count by revenging himself and Wilton when he gets out of prison. In the meantime the factory has been closed; the Wilton family is poor and the daughter, Marjorie, is working in the Thorpe factory. Thorpe's son is persecuting her and finally fires her out. The Wiltons are in greater trouble than ever.

Martin is soon released and invents a new machine for the factory. He takes the money that he stole, buys machinery, opens the old factory and puts the trust out of business after a hard fight, during which the trust attacks the factory and a battle begins. The money that Wilton stole and is paid back, and everything ends happily. Martin marries Marjorie Wilton.

rector tells his story how he went home with Rex to spend his vacation, how he met the Carewe twins, Adele with a beautiful face and fickle nature and Angela with a plain little face, but beautiful disposition. Allan falls in love with the plainer girl, Angela, and learns that although Rex is in love with Adele both the girls have given their hearts to him. After Rex and Adele announce their engagement, Allan goes back to his study to be ordained, so that he may perform the ceremony. Rex is injured in an explosion, and Adele proves faithless to him. The rector returns to his study, but some time later he is very much surprised to learn that Adele has consented to marry Rex. He arrives at the blind man's home to perform the marriage ceremony, but discovers the bride is none other than Angela, who has pretended to be her faithless sister to bring happiness to the man she adores. After the wedding the minister leaves the couple, but months later receives news of his friend's death. At this juncture a lady enters the room and the rector, with a note of pride in his voice, introduces "My wife, Angela."

THANHOUSER.

THE SCIENTIST'S DOLL (March 1).—The scientist was a very wonderful man in his own profession, but extremely selfish and somewhat of a miser. His sister, who was on her death-bed, had confided her little son to his care, but the scientist hid the fact that the young man was entitled to a large sum of money and brought him up practically as a pauper. About the time that the young nephew became of age the scientist was engaged in an experiment which he hoped would bring him everlasting fame. He had built a large doll and hoped as a result of his researches to be enabled to endow the doll with life. He had even gone so far as to supply it with a complete outfit of clothes, for he wanted it to be like other human beings when the time came for it to move about.

The nephew was in love with a bright young girl and they had planned to go to a masquerade party together. An actor friend loaned the nephew a costume of Mephistopheles, but the girl had nothing fit to wear, as she explained to her sweetheart. The young man saw the doll's outfit and realized the clothes were about the size to fit his sweetheart. He proposed that she call that evening and borrow the clothes, which she accordingly did. It happened that just as they were about ready to depart, the old man returned and cut off their escape. To avoid detection the girl played she was the doll, while the nephew, garbed as Mephisto, hid in a corner of a room. With much amusement he watched the old scientist try to bring the doll to life, and then as Mephistopheles he came forward and offered his aid with great success. The old man believed he really saw the evil one and was so overcome with terror that he confessed how he had robbed his nephew, and agreed in writing to make restitution. This he did later, so the scientist's doll really did a lot of good after all.

THE DESERT TRIBESMAN (2 reels—March 3).—A tribesman from the desert was brought before a certain Caliph, so an old legend runs, and because of his continued defiance of authority was sentenced to be executed. It fortunately happened for him that just as the sentence was about to be carried into effect, the Caliph's son and heir was brought to him, and in the name of that son the Caliph set the prisoner free.

The tribesman, who had been defiant while his life was in danger, melted when compassion was shown him, promises to mend his ways, and notifies the Caliph that if danger ever threatens him he, the tribesman would be the Caliph's friend. Some little time later the Caliph died, and a usurper seized the throne. The infant had no one to stand up for him and even his life was in danger, but his mother managed to send him across the desert to Ben Ibrahim, the Arab, hoping that the tribesman would remember his oath. The child reached the camp in safety and the Arab brought him up as his own son, educating him as he should be educated, in the hope that one day he might be able to regain the throne of his father.

When the boy became of age, the secret of his birth was told to him, and he determined to win back his birthright or die in the attempt. Not wishing to embroil his foster father, he left the Arab camp in secret, found followers and made a desperate effort to defeat the usurper. The task was rather more than he could accomplish and the battle was going against him when Ben Ibrahim, with the men of the desert, and the reinforcements turned the tide of the battle. After the usurper had been disposed of the grateful young Caliph tried to thank Ben Ibrahim, who simply replied with a smile, "Thus have I repaid to the son the debt I owed the father."

THE CALL OF THE TRAUMEREI (Three parts—Mar. 9).—Calvin Demorest, a young artist who [illegible] of a physical breakdown, is advised by his friend, Rizzio, an old music-master, to go to the country for a rest. Profiting by the advice, Calvin goes to the farm of a friend of Rizzio's, where he soon recovers and devotes his time to [illegible]. One day, while out sketching [illegible] Sumter, a country maiden who is a natural violinist, and is captivated by her remarkable talent for music. Acquaintance, intimacy and love follow in natural order. He teaches her to play "Traumerei" by whistling it for her and subsequently feels the power of her music over him when, attacked by her jealous country suitor, it arrests his hand in the act of violence.

Calvin is finally called back to the city by a letter informing him of a legacy left him by his uncle, which is to be used only as a means to complete his study of art abroad. He leaves her at the old trysting place, but the strains of Traumerei calls him back for one more view of her and he sees a picture of despair and grief that imprints itself indelibly on his heart. After remaining abroad two years the memory of Enid grows dim and he becomes infatuated with Vera De Lys, an actress. Enid, in the meantime, goes to the city and becomes a pupil of Rizzio; her pride, however, forces her to remain silent in regard to her acquaintance with Calvin.

Returning home from Europe, Calvin secures his old studio adjoining Rizzio's and, unaware of Enid's proximity, takes up his work with renewed energy and confidence. He produces many pictures, but to his dismay they are consistently rejected by the art dealers. Finally, his funds exhausted and feeling himself a failure, he destroys his work and sinks into a state of despair from which even Rizzio fails to rouse him with the announcement of the coming art exhibit. Enid, aware of Calvin's return, avoids him and finally decides to give up her music lessons through fear of an accidental meeting. She requests Rizzio to give her "Traumerei" as her last lesson and the day arrives coincident with Calvin's day of despair. The music of her violin reaches him in the room adjacent, as he sits brooding over a vial of acid, and stays his hand. He sees again the picture of despair and grief that he saw the day he left her and, snatching up brushes and palette, he produces the picture on canvas.

At the exhibit the picture wins highest honors; Enid learns that she is remembered; Rizzio discovers the secret and Vera De Lys, the French actress, who is playing in America with her company, finds Calvin again. Feeling his old infatuation for Vera return, Calvin leaves the exhibit hall with her, sending a message back to Rizzio to meet them that evening at a certain cabaret. The message gives Rizzio an idea and he arranges with the manager of the cabaret for Enid to appear as an entertainer.

That evening the call of the "Traumerei" again goes forth from Enid's violin and stills the noisy crowd. The call penetrates to a secluded nook, where Calvin and Vera have withdrawn, and reaches Calvin as he is about to succumb to his infatuation for the designing actress. Calvin answers the call, but Enid eludes him and disappears. He returns to his studio, where Rizzio again finds him in despair; but he quickly recovers and understands when Rizzio tells him to follow the call of the "Traumerei." It leads him back to the old trysting place, where he finds Enid waiting for him.

A STORY OF LITTLE ITALY (Mar. 14).—Tony, a product of one of the gangs of the Italian quarter, is released from a country institutional farm, fully determined to be a good man. But old associations, and the ridicule of his former friends lead him into the old ways, and the entire gang is caught looting an empty house. John, the leader of the gang and Tony's old pal, believes that Tony "squealed," and he swears eternal vengeance. Tony, in seeing a chance to break away, grapples with a policeman and in the struggle, the policemn is shot, not fatally.

Tony escapes into the hills, where a young revenue officer is looking for a gang of moonshiners, and here Tony meets the daughter of the leader. Mara, and they fall in love. As accommodations at the inn are few, Tony is compelled to double with the revenue officer. The sheriff, receiving a description of Tony, is about to arrest him, when Tony thinks of a badge left by the revenue officer and claims to be the revenue officer. The sheriff is satisfied, but the gang is aroused. Tony flees with Mara and the gang starts to pursue, but are captured by the revenue officers. Barclay, the leader, thinking Tony to be responsible, swears eternal revenge.

Tony and Mara settle down, and with a child there comes a full measure of happiness. But, released from prison, John and Barclay come to wreak vengeance on Tony, and Tony is only saved by the fact that, through a trick of fate, the three come together at once, and John and Barclay are so jealous of each other, that neither will permit the other to attack Tony. Barclay then coming to Tony's house, finds the true state of affairs—that Tony is not a revenue officer, and when he sees the happiness if Mara, he not only forgives Tony, but effects a reconciliation between John and Tony.

THE ADVENTURES OF SHORTY (2 parts—March 18).—Because the girls in the dance hall refuse to dance with Shorty, who is a little worse for liquor, and because the cowboys play a joke on him by having one of the boys dress up as a woman, he proceeds to shoot up the place. The boys see no way out of the excitement but to put Shorty aboard a freight train bound for parts unknown. Shorty comes to himself with a very bad head and the sounds of a quarrel in another part of the car. He investigates and finds a bum abusing a boy. Shorty interferes and gets the worse of it. The brakeman hears the noise of the struggle and attempts to stop the fight by drawing a gun, but the bum takes the weapon from the brakeman and shoots him. Shorty is accused of the crime, but the sheriff happens to be the boy's father; he gives Shorty money and returns to his home ranch.

NORTH OF 53 (2 parts—Feb. 27).—'Poleon and Francois, two French-Canadian trappers, leave for the North on their winter trapping expedition. 'Poleon leaves his sister, Celestine, in the care and protection of Jim Lewis, a private in the Canadian Mounted Police. Celestine and Lewis are engaged; she loves not wisely, but too well. Lewis refuses to keep his promise to marry her. Conscience stricken and fearing the vengeance of 'Poleon, he resigns from the service and leaves for the far North under another name. Celestine dies before her brother can reach her. 'Poleon and Francois, swearing vengeance, take the trail to the North in search of Lewis. He is employed in a fur company and has become engaged to Annie MacDougal, daughter of the bookkeeper, who betroths his daughter against her will. On her wedding eve, she runs away, seeking refuge in an abandoned log cabin, where Francois and 'Poleon happen to be. Lewis comes in search of Annie. He and 'Poleon meet. A fierce fight follows. When 'Poleon is about to be killed by Lewis, Francois comes to the rescue and kills Lewis.

DOMINO.

FOR THE WEARING OF THE GREEN (2 parts—March 5).—Paddy Dwyer, the Irish blacksmith, and his helper, Dennis Grady, who is also his daughter Norah's sweetheart, are the prime leaders in the conspiracy against the Crown. Michael Finn, a young chap about the age of Dennis, is also concerned in the movement, together with a number of Irish patriots. Michael drinks too freely one day and calls upon Norah. She resents his attentions and Dennis arrives in time to find her in the embrace of Michael; he gives him a good beating. A company of English soldiers has landed in the town and the Colonel posts a notice of reward for the capture of Paddy and Dennis. To avenge himself, Michael informs the Colonel, on shipboard, of a meeting that is to take place at the Dwyer home that evening, to which Dennis and a number of Irish patriots are invited. They put Michael to bed on shipboard after giving him something to drink. He has a very disturbing dream about the result of his act and awakens only to be filled with remorse at the betrayal of his friends. He jumps overboard, swims to shore and manages to reach the home of Dwyer, nearly exhausted, just ahead of the English troops, but too late to enable them to escape. A fierce encounter ensues after the priest and Norah are permitted to leave the cottage. The soldiers fire the thatch roof, the Irishmen fighting valiantly until their ammunition is gone. Michael is severely wounded. He suggests that he open the door, allow the soldiers to use him for a target and in the meantime Dennis and Dwyer can escape. This is done. Norah has warned the patriots of the attack and they come to the rescue, routing the soldiers. Michael dies surrounded by his friends, they ignorant of his perfidy.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Chapter 7—March 2).—The seventh reel is exclusively a dancing reel wherein Margaret goes for the time being "Tango mad." The story opens with Margaret and her aunt driving in Central Park. They alight from their automobile and walk about enjoying the many beautiful scenes. While returning home they pass a gathering of suffragettes in Times Square and Margaret's aunt, recognizing many of the leaders, stops and seizes the opportunity to introduce her niece to the ladies, among them being Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, Mrs. James Cooley, Miss Inez Milholland and Mrs. Snyder, all of whom are prominent in the "cause." So interested has Margaret become in suffrage that accompanied by her aunt, she visits the Woman's Poitical Union. While there she prevails upon her aunt to contribute a sum of money in aid of suffrage.

Upon returning home, Margaret's aunt suggests that her niece take dancing lessons and to this end retains Miss Grace Field and Mr. A. Baldwin Sloane, both of whom are noted instructors in fancy dancing. Margaret, however, dislikes the idea and finds it hard to learn, but when the two instructors glide over the floor in a whirlwind Tango dance, Margaret is all enthusiasm. So interested has she become in this dance that, characteristically, she tries to master it in a moment and thereby furnishes the material for many subsequent laughable incidents. With the departure of the teachers, Margaret presses her maid, the butler, her aunt, her dog and even pieces of furniture into service, much to their irritation. That night Margaret dreams that she is the center of a merry group who are likewise Tango mad and that the tall skyscrapers of Wall Street have caught the craze and are endeavoring to seek her for a partner.

A LESSON IN BRIDGE (March 4).—The fascinating game of bridge has completely ensnared Mrs. Willis, the pretty young wife of a Wall Street clerk, and money that should have been spent to pay household bills is squandered on cards. Mr. Willis does not approve of the game and frequently remonstrates with his wife for her extravagance. In an effort to discover who is divulging certain information at the brokerage office, both Willis and another clerk come under the surveillance of detectives. A bribe is offered Willis, which he accepts, that he might entrap the man who offers it. Two men know of this intention of Willis. One is a traveling man, the other the suspected clerk at the office.

Willis takes the money home and hides it carefully. His wife discovers it and uses a portion to pay her debts, later denying any knowledge of it. The bills are marked. One of these falls into the hands of the detectives and other evidences of Willis' seeming disloyalty are easily obtained. Summoned before the firm, he fully expects his fellow clerk to testify in his behalf. The latter stoutly denies that the conversation ever took place, and when Willis mentions the traveling man, he is confronted with the account of his death. Mrs. Willis tries to come to the rescue, but her story is not credited and Willis is discharged in disgrace. The traveling man, who is only slightly injured, learns of his friend's predicament and comes to the rescue. His reappearance frightens the guilty man into confession and the wife is cured of her love for cards by a bitter lesson.

WHEN FATE FROWNED (March 7).—A man and his wife living on the lowlands. She is a consumptive and he is out of work. A stranger comes with a sprained ankle, and the husband takes him in and gives him a bed. Later the wife's condition growing worse, the stranger now well, about to bid adieu, the husband proposes a hold-up to raise the necessary funds to take the wife out of the country. The stranger, being a fugitive from justice, readily consents. The two go to town. The husband leaves a note for his wife, telling her to be ready when they return. They rob the express office, and escape to the hills. The posse go in pursuit of the men. They elude the posse. The stranger being struck by the woman's beauty strikes the husband a blow on the head with his pistol, goes back and gets the wife, lies to her and tells her he is taking her to her husband. They start across the desert. The husband gains consciousness, finds the wife gone and thinks her untrue to him, and starts in pursuit of them. The girth from the woman's saddle breaks, giving the husband a chance to gain on them, having seen them from the top of a mountain upon which he climbed. After repairing the saddle girth, the stranger takes the woman further into the desert. Lust overcomes him. He dismounts, trying to find a secluded spot. In looking for this they pass a grave. The stranger attacks the woman. She repulses him. The effort being too much for her, she faints. The stranger sees the husband, runs on and hides behind the grave and takes deliberate aim at the unsuspecting husband. The revolver refuses to fire. A bad cartridge causes a click, which is heard by the husband. A duel follows. The woman regains consciousness, sees her husband, runs to him smilingly. He sees her, takes deliberate aim, mortally wounding an innocent woman. The stranger seeing the wife fall at the husband's feet, shoots him. Stranger clears the wife, remorse getting the better of him. Sees the posse, tries to escape. He is captured, however, and the sheriff asks him where the other man is. Then remembering that he himself had caused all of the trouble, takes the posse and shows them the grave, telling them that he killed the other man, allowing the husband freedom. But alas! too late, the woman's wound proves fatal and she dies in her husband's arms, after forgiving her husband, and he, poor fellow, is left with the body of the one he loved.

BROTHER OFFICERS (Four parts).—After returning from quieting the natives in the Hills, Lieutenant Trevor is seen relating to his brother officers an exciting experience during the recent skirmish in which his life was saved by Colonel Graham, but his yarn is cut short by the Mess Sergeant, who hands him a note requesting him to go to the Colonel's quarters at once to be introduced to his son, Harry, who has just arrived from England and gazetted to the regiment. Colonel Graham is proud of his boy's appointment and particularly asks Trevor to keep an eye on him generally, which he willingly undertakes.

For a time, while the novelty of the new life lasts young Graham is attentive to his duties, but like so many before him he fails in the strength of will to withstand the "chipping" of the older officers and the temptation of the card tables, with the result that he is unable to meet his obligations. Trevor learns of his indebtedness, and for the Colonel's sake gives him sufficient to pay off his debts, making him promise to be a man and refuse to play again. Nevertheless, the promise soon falls through, and at dinner one night Trevor notices that he scarcely touches his meal and is so unconscious of the surroundings that he has to be told to rise and toast the King. This is unnoticed by the other officers, but Trevor keeps a sharp eye on his charge. Shortly after young Graham leaves the mess room, and is quickly followed by Trevor, who, with the aid of a mirror, hanging in the card room, sees the foolish youth tamper with the cards. Other officers now enter, and a game is suggested, in which Trevor very unusually offers to join, knowing as he does that the cards have been faked by young Graham. The game goes on smoothly for the first few hands before young Graham has an occasion to introduce his foul play. One of the officers has a good hand and backs it heavily, while Harry knows that by introducing a certain card he can beat him. The temptation proves too great, considering the stakes laid, and he substitutes the card for one of his own and wins. Trevor has watched him and removes the other cards from his knee, but in the meantime the fraud has been discovered by one of the others, who openly remarks: "Gentlemen, there is a cheat among us." These unusual words in the card room bring the whole company to their feet with the exception of Harry Graham, who remains seated with bended head. In the midst of the uproar the Colonel enters, and Trevor, to save the situation, confesses to be the cheat, and is placed under arrest, awaiting an inquiry. As he leaves the room his brother officers turn their backs, and the Colonel, believing his trust has been misplaced in the man whose life he saved, addresses the remaining officers before leaving, almost broken-hearted. The incident is kept secret from his daughter, Mabel, with whom Trevor has become intimate, and had often escorted on her morning ride.

Next day, when Trevor does not come as usual, the Colonel has difficulty in explaining the reason of his absence. Believing him to be on duty, she goes off unaccompanied, and by chance meets Mr. Jackson, a civil commissioner of the district, and an old friend of the Colonel's. Mabel is persuaded by Mr. Jackson to visit his wife, which she consents to do, and he undertakes to inform her father. Mrs. Jackson makes her unexpected guest very welcome; but their pleasure is cut short by their black boy entering, who informs them that the natives are coming to attack the bungalow.

Preparations are at once made by Mabel, Mrs. Jackson, and her daughter, to defend themselves, while the boy is despatched to ask Colonel Graham for assistance. The Colonel, on learning the news, decides to send Lieutenant Trevor in charge of the relief party in the hope that he will choose death sooner than disgrace at the inquiry into the card scandal. Trevor receives the news, and, accompanied by young Graham, sets out with a company of men to disband the raiders. Soon after the departure Mr. Jackson arrives, and, in ignorance of what is taking place at his bungalow, informs his old friend, the Colonel, of his daughter's intentions. Naturally the Colonel is much concerned at the news, and accompanied by Mr. Jackson, heads another relief party.

In the meantime, the women have made a bold resistance, but are about to give in when Trevor and his party arrive only to find that the natives are far superior in numbers and that their ammunition is insufficient. The faithful black boy again comes to the rescue and leads the party to safety by an underground passage, Trevor alone remaining to carry out his Colonel's wishes; but young Graham's conscience forces him to return and stand by the man who has befriended him. Together they fight until Graham falls wounded, when Trevor continues single-handed.

As the remainder of the party, led by the boy, come into the open from the passage they are met by Colonel Graham and Mr. Jackson with the second relief. After a hasty but impressive meeting no time is lost in saving the two officers. The Colonel is broken-hearted to see his son wounded while Trevor is untouched, but young Graham explains to his father how his companion shielded him and had, though innocent, tried to carry out the Colonel's wishes, and the contingent returns to barracks triumphant in the fight, the incident of the card party being forgotten.

THE GREAT BULLION ROBBERY (Three parts).—"Probably the largest consignment of bullion ever made to a local bank was delivered yesterday to the Great Western Bank."

The announcement in a newspaper that attracts the attention of Stephen Crasp, a notorious swell mobsman, and he at once sets his evil hand to work to devise a scheme whereby the bullion may become his own. He at once pays a visit to a gang of men, on whom he can rely to carry out any enterprise of this character, no matter how dangerous or daring. Crasp selects a man from among the interested group of desperadoes, and together they visit the bank and spy out the lay of the land. An empty shop next door to the bank premises attracts the attention of the pair. Crasp at once calls on the estate agents, and by means of false credentials secures the lease of the shop and basement. The gang, under the direction of the master mind of Crasp, make hasty preparations to carry out their coup, and later a van pulls up to the empty shop, and a number of cases are deposited in the cellar.

These are opened and disclose the latest types of instruments and tools for drilling and boring. In the course of a short while an entrance is effected into the bank vaults, and there is discovered a tempting pile of gold bars. The gang speedily transfer these to cases, which are loaded on to the van, and soon disappears into the night. In the country lane, however, the van breaks down, and the robbers are for the time being brought to a standstill. At this critical moment in their affairs, fate helps them. A motor car appears round the bend of the road. The chauffeur is at once knocked senseless, and the car commandeered. Once more the gang are on the road with the precious metal. The chauffeur recovers from the attack, and struggling to his feet, hastily journeys to the nearest police station, where the alarm is raised. The mounted police are called out, and a tremendous chase ensues.

At a level crossing the car manages to evade the pursuers, but the chauffeur keeps well up to the gang, and, growing desperate, takes a thrilling leap from his horse into the tonneau of the car. In a short while the river is reached, and Crasp with his men, with the now unconscious chauffeur and the ingots of gold, cross the stream in a boat that has been awaiting their arrival. While the booty is being transferred into the riverside building, the chauffeur, reviving, leaps overboard and swims rapidly away, escaping the revolver shots aimed at him by the gang. The river police, hearing the sound of firing, row in the direction of the shooting, and pick up the nearly exhausted chauffeur. More police are called, and then an amazing struggle takes place between the gang and the police on the boat and in the water. Eventually Stephen Crasp is cornered within the wharf premises, and the entire gang placed under arrest. The plucky chauffeur is congratulated for his very important share in the capture of a dangerous man and his criminal associates.

GAUMONT.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE JUNGLE (Three parts).—Tom Holkar and John Palmer, in love with Betty, decided to go into the jungle unarmed and there attract the attention of the wild beasts, leaving them to decide who should marry the girl. At the last moment Holkar's nerve failed and, dooming Palmer to death he shot at him with a revolver and fled into the jungle. Betty, anxious at the long absence of the men, went in search of them and found Palmer lying seriously wounded with difficulty defending himself from the attacks of a panther. Betty succeeded in despatching the animal and rescuing Palmer. Later the body of the revengeful Holkar was found in the jungle partly devoured by wild beasts. For a long time there was much conjecture as to the cause of his mysterious death, but neither Betty nor Palmer allowed such treachery as his to interfere with their happiness.

NEWBURGH N. Y.

United States. They are spied and the Secret Service Department is notified of their operations. A detective, John Carey, is sent to shadow them. On the way across the ocean he meets Miss Andrews, a young American heiress and her mother, who are to tour Europe. Carey falls in love with Miss Andrews. Before parting when the ship arrives, Miss Andrews gives Carey her photograph. The smugglers arrive in Tangier. They are notified by a criminal, who sees them examining diamonds. He follows them in their room and attacks Burgess. A fight ensues on the balcony. Carey, the detective, rushes to their assistance and saves the life of Burgess. He finds a diamond in their room, presumably lost by Burgess in the scuffle, and deduces from this discovery that Burgess, and his companion are the fugitives he is after.

They meet again on the ship. Miss Andrews and her mother are also passengers. He is soon engaged to Miss Andrews. The smugglers take advantage of this fact, forge a letter purporting to come from her, stating that she will take in some of the diamonds without declaring them. This note comes to Carey's attention and he is led to believe that his sweetheart is in league with the smugglers. On nearing port, Burgess slides over the side of the vessel and starts to row to shore. Carey discovers him in time, fires a shot, which makes a hole in the boat. Carey sends a wireless message to the customs men for help. Seeing his man drowning, he dives in after him and holds him up till the revenue launch arrives, thus placing Burgess under arrest for smuggling. The diamonds are confiscated. Carey is promoted and marries the heiress.

WHEN MEN WOULD KILL (Three parts).—Briefly told, the story concerns the long standing warfare between the Charltons and Redferns. Grace Charlton, a general favorite with everybody, is sent to New York to study voice under the leading teachers of the metropolis. During her rise to fame, and her subsequent successful appearance in grand opera, Grace never forgets the lion-hearted Jim Redfern, who has completely won her by his primitive wooing. Much as she loves Jim, she does not hesitate to take sides with her family against him when the feud breaks out anew.

Grace receives a telegram that her father has been wounded, and hastens to her humble Southern home to direct the fight for revenge waged by her brothers against the Redferns. Later, Grace receives a bullet in her shoulder that was intended for her father. The next night, the Charltons' home takes fire, and they are rescued with great difficulty by old man Redfern and his sons. Jim Redfern's heroism in rescuing Grace has brought the feud to an end, and the story closes with the marriage of Grace and Jim, and the pact of friendship sealed forever between the families of Charlton and Redfern.

THE CONFESSION (Three parts).—Enrico Carlos, an Italian peasant, is the official gamekeeper for County Ferny. Rose, his wife, is an invalid, and the family is in hard straits. Tony, the son, is anxious to aid his sick mother and struggling father, and emigrates to America. After a number of years in which he has made money, he returns to Italy. He is heartbroken on landing, to learn of his dear mother's death. His father has acquired money in some way, and now shares the luxuries of life with Tony's sister, Lisa, and an adopted sister, named Mary.

Tony is attracted by Mary's charming way, and spends much of his time in her company, but he cannot discover the source of his father's income. One day he comes across an old wallet of Count Ferny's. He is in deep thought when his father enters. Questioning him, Tony finally gets him to confess that he stole the money from the Count when he discovered him murdered by some unknown assassins. Tony retells the story to Mary of his father's crime. Fired by a mutual desire to escape the influence of the tainted money, they marry and sail for America.

A FATHER'S CRIME (Three parts).—Marius, a young painter, is in love with Irene Lambert, but is rejected by her father, and ordered from the house. Manfredi, supposedly wealthy, seeks Irene's hand and is favored by Lambert.

Irene receives reports from America dictated by her father, that Marius has been killed in a fight with some ruffians. Lambert finally persuades Irene to marry Manfredi. Five years later, Manfredi is in bad straits from gambling and dissipation, and treats Irene and his child cruelly.

Marius, who has acquired wealth in America, returns to summer at a French watering resort. He risks his life to rescue a small child from drowning, but cannot save the child's father, who drowns. The mother of the child (Irene) calls on the rescuer to express her gratitude, and recognizes Marius. After a lapse of time, they are [illegible]

THE MAN WHO CAME BACK (Columbus—5 parts).—[illegible] Roberts, ably assisted by his son, Stanton, has built up a large manufacturing business. Mr. Roberts arranges with a friend of the family, a wealthy banker named Vincent Martin, to advance sufficient money to completely rebuild and extend his factories, and to also extend payment of various notes and mortgages which the banker holds. Martin accepts the proposals and confident of success, Roberts proceeds to carry out his schemes. Some months later the work is completed and the shareholders gather to inspect and approve the rebuilt factory. Vincent Martin, at heart a scoundrel and unscrupulous man, chooses this opportune moment to avenge himself for an old grievance which had long since been forgotten and forgiven by Roberts. He calls in his notes and without giving justifiable reasons refuses to meet bills that he promised to back. Broken-hearted, Franklin Roberts seeks oblivion in the river. Just at this time the first child arrives in the home of Stanton Roberts, a little girl. The sad end of the manufacturer causes a sensation in the money market and at a meeting of shareholders and creditors of the firm, the son, Stanton, has to face the fury of the men who have lost heavily through his father's misfortune. He vows to repay all. A few days later, mournful, but determined, Stanton gazes upon the scene of his former triumphs for the last time, bids farewell to his young wife and baby and starts off for distant Africa to rebuild his shattered fortune. Fate turns against him again, however, and the ship sinks in midocean with all on board. The shock kills the wife; her little daughter is adopted by a neighbor, Mrs. Wild.

Twenty years pass and one evening Roger Martin, son of the wealthy banker, visits the theater to witness the debut of a pretty and talented dancer, "La Marquita," who is none other than the daughter of Stanton Roberts. Young Roger Martin is fascinated by the dancer's charms and obtains an introduction through a friend, with the result that a mutual affection springs up. About this time the papers are filled with reports of a rich gold discovery at the Cape. These reports interest the banker, Martin, who is prominent in mining affairs. He commissions a skillful woman, named Maud Sterling, to go to South Africa to make secret inquiries for him, and obtain information which would be difficult for a man to get. Meanwhile La Mariquita and Roger seek every opportunity to meet each other. One day Mrs. Wild receives an anonymous letter containing a photograph warning her of her adopted daughter's meeting with the banker's son and advising her to put a stop to a match which, owing to the young people's different stations in life cannot end happily. Mrs. Wild calls at the banker's house, and a family meeting ends by Roger announcing his intention to stick to La Mariquita. The banker, realizing argument is futile, calls secretly the next day on Mrs. Wild and La Mariquita and offers the former $2,500 if she will promise never to see Roger again. He receives his crumpled check in the face for his pains; but the poor girl, in spite of her love for Roger, realizes that it would be best to flee from such men to forget. They decide to sail for a new land and next day book passage on the "S. S. Portugal" for South Africa. On the same boat Maud Sterling is a passenger. In the gold fields the prospectors eagerly stake their claims. Among them is a stalwart square jawed man. Alone he sits and reads over his little diary. He calls himself Treberson, but he is none other than Stanton Roberts.

Fortune favors him. Maud Sterling is attracted by him, and is the means of getting two roughnecks to steal his horses in order to prevent him from registering his claim and getting his license at the stipulated hour. He manages to outwit them, however, and in spite of his enemies crowding the sheriff's office, by a clever ruse obtains the necessary papers. The next day the horse thieves try to waylay him on his way to take possession of the mine, but again he wins. Maud Sterling now proceeds to seize every opportunity of meeting the wealthy miner. La Mariquita, who is earning her living by dancing, gives a special performance in a saloon at Long Creek.

Treberson attends and protects the pretty dancer from some drunken miners. She is very grateful to her rescuer and subsequently tells him the story of her life. Treberson is overjoyed at so strangely finding his lost daughter, but decides it will be best policy not to announce the fact. But alas! he notices that some melancholy secret makes the young girl sad. It is her unhappy love affair, but her father must not know. In honor of his daughter the new mine is named "La Mariquita." Maud Sterling is jealous of the dancer and accuses Treberson of neglecting her since his meeting with that lady. She subsequently persuades one of the horse thieves to commit a cowardly crime. While resting with her foster mother the scoundrel rides by and in cold blood, shoots the defenseless and innocent girl. The dastardly act is witnessed by a friend of Treberson, who gives chase. An exciting melee ensues, and the would-be murderer receives just punishment for his crime. Analysis is taken of the ore of various mines in the district and that of "La Mariquita" proves to be by far the richest. The adjoining mine, the "Eldorado," turns out to be valueless. This mine has been worked and financed for some time by Martin Vincent, the banker.

A few days later, to celebrate the recovery from her injuries, Treberson announces a remarkable firework display. The golden soil of the "La Mariquita" mine is to be broken by a terrific dynamite explosion. Crowds gather and witness the unusual sight of thousands of tons of rock and earth being hurled into the air.

In Paris some time later, Treberson, with his daughter, visits scenes of his former life, unrecognized. For twenty years he has been harboring his vengeance, and one day posing as a friend, phones up the banker, Martin, and suggests that he might like to meet the now famous Treberson, the mining magnate. Martin, who is deeply involved in mining stock, arranges to meet him the next day. Treberson disguises himself with a beard, and is not recognized by the banker, who invites him to his house. La Mariquita attends and again meets her old lover, Roger. The pent up wrath of twenty years cannot be kept back longer by Treberson. In a private room he reveals his identity and taking his enemy in a grip of steel forces the trembling coward to his knees, at the same time telling him that his African mines are worthless. Producing a revolver, Treberson suggests that the now ruined man should do one honest act in his miserable existence by taking his own life. Just at this moment Roger Martin breaks into the room and dashes between his father and Treberson. La Mariquita, who has been fearful of something dreadful happening, now arrives on the scene and tells her father of her love for Roger. The young man has plenty of grit and tells his father he has not lost courage, but will work and repay his creditors, and try to atone for his father's misdeeds. Treberson, at heart a kind man, is greatly impressed by the young man's courage and forgives the banker, afterward consenting to the marriage between his daughter and the banker's son.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH.—Gerard, the eldest son of a wealthy family, is destined by his father for the church, although his own inclinations lie elsewhere. The young fellow is a born artist. His first success comes when he reads of the announcement of a public competition in which a big prize is to be paid for the best picture. It is at this period that he meets Margaret and her aged father. He falls in love with Margaret, and their fast-growing affection is viewed with great concern by the burgomaster of Rotterdam who is keeping in his possession some valuable parchments which relate to Margaret's fortune. Gerard's affection is discovered by his father, who sternly reprimands him, bidding him to think of the vocation in life that he has to fill. Gerard defies his father and family, and goes to his patroness, who, on hearing his story, tells him to put aside all ideas of priesthood for the present, and that she will pay for him to go to Rome and study art. Gerard gratefully accepts her offer, but at the same time he determines that before he leaves, he will wed Margaret secretly.

In the meantime his father has been to the burgomaster, attempting to put the law in force against his disobedient son. The burgomaster, fearing for himself if the union between Gerard and Margaret should come to pass, promises his aid. Accordingly Gerard is torn from the arms of his newly-made bride at the very foot of the altar. He is imprisoned in the burgomaster's house, but thanks to the efforts of Margaret and his sister and crippled brother, he makes his escape. While escaping he accidentally discloses a trapdoor which conceals the secret hiding-place of the burgomaster's papers, and thinking that some of them will be useful to him in his work as an artist, he fills his pockets full. He finds on examination that one of them is the actual document relating to Margaret's fortune, and he keeps this, giving the others to Margaret to bury in the garden. He then sets out for Rome and on his way falls in with Denys of Burgundy, a Burgundian soldier of fortune. A friendship springs up between the gentle artist and the rough soldier. Then follows the attempted murder of the two men in the inn by the rascally landlord and his two accomplices, from which Gerard and his companion emerge victorious.

Gerard arrives at Rome, and continues his studies. In the meantime his brothers, who have always been jealous of him, discover his whereabouts, and with the connivance of the burgomaster, send a letter to him to the effect that Margaret is dead. This information drives Gerard to such a state of despair that when his life is attempted by an assassin who is bribed to kill him by Princess Cloelia, whose overtures he has rejected, he offers no resistance; but the assassin overcome with remorse drops his dagger and flees from the scene.

A year elapses, and Gerard, now a priest, returns to his own country. He is summoned to the death-bed of an old hermit and when he dies, Gerard takes up his life in the old man's cave. His wife comes to the spot to pray, and recognizes Gerard by a birthmark on his hand. The unfortunate man then learns for the first time that he has been deceived, that his wife is alive and that he has a son five years old. When he realizes the extent of the treacherous trick that has been played upon him, he bursts in upon his family and denounces his brothers. The rage of his father knows no bounds, and he is with difficulty restrained from slaying the son who has wrecked his elder brother's life.

He next visits the burgomaster, and by the aid of the incriminating parchment, which he has

JOAN OF ARC (2 parts).—In the Fifteenth Century, France was in the throes of a warfare in which the French, aided by the Scotch, were pitted against the English, who were assisted by the Burgundians. In October, 1428, the English began the siege of Orleans. This siege was intermittently broken by the French, who occasionally sallied forth to attack the enemy. In February, 1429, however, the siege was tightened and remained so until the arrival of Joan of Arc at the end of April. Up to that time the inhabitants of Orleans suffered many privations.

Joan of Arc was born about January 5, 1412, in the village of Domremy, on the banks of the Meuse. When she was about thirteen years of age, she received a spiritual command to set forth to save France. For five years she heard these commands and finally determined to obey them. She persuaded her uncle to conduct her to Captain Robert de Baudricourt at Vaucouleurs, to whom she explained her mission. At first he had no faith in her, but was subsequently convinced and sent her to Charles VII at Chinon. When her arrival was announced, the dauphin tested her wonderful powers by changing places with one of his courtiers, but Joan was not deceived. She promised him that she would lead him to Rheims to be crowned King of France. After some delay at Chinon, Joan set out at the head of an army to relieve Orleans, arriving there on April 29, 1429. She sent a letter to the English besiegers commanding them to raise the siege of Orleans, but she received only defiance in return. A desperate battle followed, which ended in a brilliant victory for the French. But their task was not completed, and on the 7th of May the French attacked the stronghold of the English at Les Tourelles, which was directly across the river from Orleans. The battle was a furious one, at which the Maid was wounded by an arrow which passed through her armor. This, however, did not deter her, and she pressed the enemy still harder until the battle ended in another triumph for the French.

After her victorious campaign, Joan of Arc successfully conducted Charles VII to the city of Rheims, where he was crowned King of France on July 17, 1429. A long campaign followed, which extended to May, 1430, when Joan led an attack against the Duke of Burgundy at Compiegne. On May 24 while making a sortie, the Maid was surrounded and taken prisoner by the Burgundians. She was taken to Rouen and placed in prison. After a trial which lasted for several days, she was condemned to die as a heretic. On May 30, 1431, Joan of Arc was taken to the Old Market in the city of Rouen and burned to death. Thus ended the tragic career of the Maid of Orleans.

THE DESERT'S STING (Three parts—Feb. 28).—Many years ago, John Blake, Will Blake's grandfather, on a hunt for curios among the Indains, is made love to by an Indian girl, who, after the Indian fashion of wooing, sings to him the song of lamentation, and when he waves her away she prophesies that one day one of her race will call to one of his, and the white man will answer.

Years later, Will Blake, the grandson, goes into the western desert, on a hunt for radium, with Professor Edwards; his fiancee, Helen Edwards, the Professor's daughter, accompanies them. Before starting on the trip, Helen, in examining the many curious Indian relics in Blake's apartments, has a vision of an Indian girl sitting playing with a rattlesnake. Arriving in the West, the party start prospecting and Blake is bitten by a snake concealed in the cactus. Alema, a half-breed Indian girl, sucks part of the poison from his arm, and takes him to her tent, saying that in three days she will know if he will live or die. She refuses to allow anyone to see him until the allotted time.

Apoe, a Navajo brave, tries to induce Alema to return to the Navajoe camp. She refuses, having fallen in love with Blake. Apoe understanding, attempts to kill Blake, but is prevented by Alema. During his convalescence, Blake has become infatuated with Alema, and Helen mistaking his restlessness for symptoms of ill health, they decide to return home. They are ready to return to the East, when Blake hears Alema outside his window singing the song of Lamentation; he is irresistably drawn to her, and follows her to her tent. Helen, seeing them going away into the desert, follows and demands that he choose between them. He decides to remain with Alema, whom Helen now recognizes as the girl of her vision.

Apoe succeeds in filling Blake's water bag with poisoned water. Blake becomes sick and in his delirium calls for Helen. Alema, believing it will save his life, goes to the city for Helen, arriving on the [illegible] is to be married to a former sweetheart. Throwing aside her wedding garments, she hurries with the Indian to the side of her lost love, only to find that in the absence of Alema, Apoe has murdered the sick man. The story ends with Helen and Alema, grief stricken, and wandering each in a different direction, as the sun goes down over the desert waste.

ELSIE VENNER (Three Parts—Mar. 4).—Elsie Venner is a posthumous child that is infected with the venom of the snake that killed her mother previous to the birth of Elsie. She is beautiful in appearance, except for the blemish of a birthmark resembling the bite of a snake, which is kept concealed by a heavy gold chain about her neck. In fits of temper which occur upon the slightest provocation, the characteristic rage of the deadly reptile is plainly evident. Her every action is suggestive of the movements of the serpent, and she subconsciously exerts the hypnotic influence of the rattlesnake, whose nature has become part of her own.

Dick Venner, her cousin, is madly in love with Elsie and is insanely jealous of Barnard Langdon, the young school master, for whom Elsie shows a decided preference. Elsie comes upon Langdon sitting in the woods and discovers a snake, coiled and ready to strike him. She hypnotizes it, and saves his life.

Dick threatens to kill Langdon if he does not cease his attentions to Elsie, and plots with Arabella Brown, with whom he is carrying on a clandestine love affair, to discredit Langdon. Langdon confides in Doctor Kittredge, the Venner family physician, telling him of his love for Elsie and of the strange influence she has over him. Doctor Kittredge, realizing that the secret must now be divulged, tells Langdon of Elsie's half serpent nature and advises against marriage. Langdon refuses to be dissuaded and the doctor hurries to Mr. Venner with a powerful but dangerous antidote, that he believes will cure Elsie, but may prove fatal.

He explains to Mr. Venner that the time has come when a desperate chance must be taken, and informs him that for safety sake, he has labelled the bottle "Poison." Mr. Venner, hesitating to take so serious a step, places the bottle on the mantle shelf.

Langdon, disregarding the advice of the doctor, proposes marriage to Elsie and is accepted. Elsie in her joy tels of her happiness to the old negress, who was her mother's maid. The faithful old servant, fearful of the results of a marriage, tells Elsie of the circumstance of her mother's death, and the effect it has had on her, and advises her never to marry. Elsie, feeling that the old servant has attempted to rob her of her happiness, goes into one of her wild rages and drives the old negress from the room. She finds the bottle labelled "Poison," and conceals it in her dress, determined to take it, if anything prevented her marriage to Langdon.

On his way through the woods to visit Elsie, Langdon is intercepted by Arabella, who at a signal from Dick, throws her arms about Langdon's neck, just as Elsie arrives, having been told by Dick that Langdon was waiting there. Believing her lover unfaithful, Elsie rushes off into the thickest part of the woods, and drinks the contents of the bottle. After an all night search she is found by her father, the doctor and Langdon. The doctor, finding the empty bottle, removes the gold cord from her neck, and discovering that the birthmark has disappeared, announces that she has been cured, just as Elsie recovers consciousness and is folded in the arms of her lover.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

LOCAL ADVERTISING

Are you a firm believer in local advertising?

We, of Warner's Features, Inc., honestly believe that our three part releases are the finest in the land; in fact, we can furnish indisputable proof to substantiate our belief. But observation has taught us that the average exhibitor does not realize the immense value of printer's ink and white space. Warner's Features, plus advertising, equals a sure gain in attendance.

THE RUBY OF DESTINY

A Remarkable Detective Story

IN THREE PARTS

A beautiful, thrilling story of a modern European Dynasty that teems with the chivalry and romance enveloping the royalty of this hidden monarchy. A superb picture story that will recall George Barr McCutcheon's famous "Graustark Stories."

"I SHALL SERVE YOU FAITHFULLY"

The story carries one through Italy, France and Switzerland. A superb cast portrays a fascinating plot with perfect settings. The quest for the stolen ruby of the Royal household is filled with dramatic action, and exciting situations. The Photography is so perfect that you will unanimously proclaim it a superior production.

THE PERIL OF THE HOUSE OF STYR

Sequel to the Ruby of Destiny

IN THREE PARTS

This fitting second chapter further tells us of the chase for the precious jewel. The plot is here carried out with precision. You follow the culprits to Venice (with its Grand Canal and the far famed St Mark's Cathedral). Then you are taken up into the heights of the wonderful Tyrolean Alps, and thus held in a state of speculation until the very end.

The superb scenes about the beautiful medieval Castle of the House of Styr are most fascinating. In fact, the entire picture is wonderful and will arouse intense interest.

THUGS ATTACK THE MILL OWNER

the Normandie wedding etc., are very impressive.

There are many big dramatic situations and scenes of teeming action where your heart will ache for the little cripple girl, the idol of the mill hands; and her pathetic struggle for a livelihood. Likewise the inventor's successful fight for the recognition of his invention.

You can learn just as much from Mr. Sloane and Miss Field as if you were paying them $50 an hour, which is what they actually get from their metropolitan pupils. The titles of all the dances and the names of all the steps are given on the screen.

After you have seen this wonderful picture perhaps you will dream the way "Our Mutual Girl" does. Her excitement about the tango gets to be such an infatuation that she dances with everybody—her Aunt, the Butler, the Footman and the Count. At night, with the fever of the dance still in her veins, she gets up and whirls dizzily about with the furniture. And then she imagines that she is Exhibitors in or near New York City, and those residing at distant points in New York State, Northern New Jersey, or any of the New England States, have an opportunity to see the three and four-part money-drawing features of the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Co. before they book them. The latest releases are shown Wednesdays and Fridays of each week, beginning at 10.30 A. M., at the Academy of Music, Fourteenth Street and Irving Place. These performances, given for the special benefit of owners and managers of motion picture theatres, are complimentary, and everybody interested is invited to be present. At the headquarters of the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Co., 130 West Forty-sixth Street, two beautiful little theatres have been built. Each is equipped with the very latest and most approved projectors, and features will be shown at any time upon request. This makes it possible for exhibitors to make up their programs intelligently, and inasmuch as exclusive territorial rights are guaranteed to each exhibitor, his interests are fully protected. Adjoining the Two Little Theatres is a large room in which all paper is displayed —one, three and six sheets, colored pictures for lobby displays in attractive frames, heralds and photographs. In fact, features and all accompanying advertising matter are offered on their merits, and exhibitors have a chance to accept or reject that which does not please them.

"A Marriage of Convenience"

A DRAMATIC TRIUMPH

IN THREE REELS

Betrayed by her girl chum, who elopes with her fiance, Bessie Ford, to save her pride, determines to be married before the announced date of the wedding. She makes a financial arrangement with a poor man to go through the ceremony with her and be her husband in name only. How this amazing tangle is brought to a delightful ending is splendidly told in this extraordinary film, which is

Replete With Superb Acting

Presenting scenes of terrific emotionalism in which Miss Enid Markey (who played the lead in "The Mexican Rebellion") does exceptional work. The man wins the love of his "wife in name only" by his heroic conduct and admirable bravery in scenes of sensationalism and danger.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

Ventilate This Way

It's Better and Cheaper

As soon as the performance is over, set your fan running full speed exhaust. You will have drawn all the foul air out by the time the next audience is in. Then set your fan running slow or medium speed intake so as to draw in fresh air in not too great quantities during the performance. You can ventilate this way with

KIMBLE

Alternating-Current

FANS

They are the only variable speed, REVERSIBLE alternating-current fans made.

You can run at any speed from slow to fast—there are a great number of steps in between. No other fan gives so wide a range.

The one fan may be used as either intake or exhaust. No other fan can be used that way.

And remember—Kimble Fans reduce current consumption in direct proportion to every reduction from maximum speed. No other fan does that.

You save money and ventilate better when you have a Kimble Fan. Write for the Red Catalog. It gives the facts.

It Runs Silently

Made in sizes from 18" to 42" with capacities of from 2500 to 22,000 cubic feet of air per minute.

"IN TIME OF PEACE—PREPARE FOR WAR"

the advent of the DAY AND NIGHT SCREEN was at a time when the airdomes throughout the country were about to close—their season being ended. We therefore confined our campaign to the introduction of "The Peerless"—the indoor screen—and you all know the tremendous strides it has made in the few short months it has been upon the market. And now, with the outdoor season rapidly drawing near, it is fitting that we should make known to the air-dome proprietor the fact that we are now taking orders—and many of them—for "The Pioneer"—the outdoor screen. This is the screen which makes it possible for you to operate your airdome IN THE DAYTIME. You have gone through a peaceful winter, but war is at your threshold, and the air-dome men who adopt "The Pioneer" will be the victors and carry off the spoils. Write for catalogue.

Cleans a building of Rats and Mice in short time, keeps it cleaned, for it is always ready for use Made of galvanized iron, can't get out of order, lasts for years. Large number can be caught daily. Go to Catcher mornings, remove device inside, which only takes few seconds, take out dead rats and mice, replace device, it is ready for another catch. Small piece cheese is used, doing away with poisons. Catcher is 18 inches high, 10 inches diameter. When rats pass device they die, no marks left on them. Catcher is always clean. One of these Catchs set in a livery stable in Scranton, Pa., caught over 100 rats in a month. One sent prepaid to any place in United States upon receipt of $3. Catcher, 8 in. high, for mice only, prepaid $1. On account of shipping charges being prepaid, remittance is requested with order. H. D. SWARTS, Inventor and Manufacturer, Scranton, Pa.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

THE REFORM CANDIDATE

There Is a Stunt In "The Reform Candidate" (New Majestic) that Is the Best Stunt You Ever Saw In Moving Pictures!

A girl crawls out of the tenth story window of an office building and glides along a mighty narrow cornice WHILE YOU HOLD YOUR BREATH! Is that sufficiently sensational for the most sensation-hungry of you? FRANCELIA BILLINGTON, "the girl the critic found," is the girl on the cornice. That critic found her for good purpose if you book "The Reform Candidate," in 3 reels. Your audience will be electrified by Miss Billington's splendid "stunt"—and they'll applaud their hands off when, through her aid, Lamar Johnston as the Reform Candidate smashes the "Ring" to smithereens. "The Reform Candidate" was released Sunday, Feb. 22. On Sunday, March 1, there is no New Majestic because the picture on the next release day—Tuesday, March 3—is a two-reeler, "The Stronger Hand," with an all-star cast. It's Ernest Joy, Gene Pallette, Billie West, Howard Davies, Victory Bateman, Fred Hamer, Clifford Gray and Demetrio Mitsoraz, the Greek Photoplayer—SOME cast! On Friday, March 7, is "The Rector's Story," told by Lee Hill, Joe Swickard, Lamar Johnstone, Clara Byers and Francelia Billington.

"THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN"

NO. 6

"THREE BAGS OF SILVER"

HAVING rescued the stolen Sacred Elephant and restored it to its devotees, Kathlyn and her party are captured by the brigands and held for ransom. Kathlyn, lashed to the cage of a famished tiger, with death at her back and facing death, makes a marvelous escape.

IN TWO REELS — RELEASED MARCH 9th

March 10th "SUPPRESSED NEWS"

A star reporter "kills" a sensation, and wins a wife. Up-to-date drama.

March 11th "THE SPEEDWAY OF DESPAIR"

An innocent man serves time, and is freed with murder in his heart; but is saved from himself. A pathetic play. On the same reel with

"THE CATHEDRAL AND LEANING TOWER OF PISA"

March 12th "KID PINK AND THE MAHARAJAH"

A boasting sheriff is hypnotized and dreams he is having a triumphant adventure. Corking comedy.

March 13th "ELIZABETH'S PRAYER"

The petition of a little girl removes the estrangement of her parents. A sympathetic story.

THE HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, first released as a regular weekly feature Saturday, February 28th, made an instantaneous and pronounced hit,—showing the events of the world's week at a glance.

ALAN DALE

The Celebrated Dramatic Critic, Writes in the New York American of Sunday, February 15th, 1914

I had an awfully good time at the opening of the Vitagraph Theatre. It seemed like a new experience, with a certain piquancy to it. Nothing to do but look! Plays were there, wihout voices, and the very silence was enjoyable. Then one's imagination was allowed to work so agreeably. I prefer my own imagination to the "words" that are cast on the screen. Sometimes these words, banal and trite, spoil the illusion. In pictures one can imagine such a lot! I love them when they don't dot the i's and cross the t's. The Vitagraph pictures were certainly very beautiful ones, without a flicker in them.

Alan Dale is right:—

The pictures shown at the Vitagraph Theatre and all other theatres that use the Power's Cameragraph No. 6A are shown "without a flicker." Projection of motion pictures is always subject to criticism when the picture is marred with flicker or jump. You can secure yourself against this criticism by installing POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6A, the motion picture projecting machine without an equal. Inform yourself of our patented intermittent movement and other distinctive features of this perfect machine, all details of which are given in our illustrated catalog G.

James Cruze (Richelieu) and Flo La Badie (His Ward) Are Perfect HOUSE-PACKERS in "Cardinal Richelieu's Ward"

With James Cruze as Richelieu and Flo La Badie as Julie De Mortemar—the Ward—you see these sterling artists in their best joint effort to date. The stars of "Star of Bethlehem" were especially reunited for this "Big Production" so that YOU COULD CROWD YOUR HOUSE. There is no use to print tons of description of "CARDINAL RICHELIEU'S WARD," for the very fact that it IS a "Big Production" should guarantee its worth. Remember, though, that it was first of the big 'uns to be produced in its entirety in the great new Thanhouser Studio. Remember, for advertising purposes, the splendid cast: Cruze, La Badie, Morris Foster, Lila Chester, Justus Barnes, Arthur Bower and Nolan Gane. Remember to see that nearest Continental or Mutual office for the attractive arrangement that gives you for exclusive first-run use for a full year in your locality. Absolute protection is yours under this system. No more advertising a feature heavily to learn the fellow down the street is going to get it, too. All in four reels and all BIG in story, cast and settings.

For March--"CARDINAL RICHELIEU'S WARD" with James Cruze and Flo La Badie

THANHOUSER THREE-A-WEEK

Sunday, March 8th—"GUILTY OR NOT GUILTY" is a Mignon Anderson dramatic feature—you'll cry for her when she faces Judge Charles Horan! For the first time in picture history one of the Thanhouser Twins appears in a film without the other—which one we leave you to puzzle out! Other of the marvelous Thanhouser juveniles who take part in this picture are The Kidlet, Leland Benham and Roy Hauck.

Tuesday, March 10th—"KATHLEEN, THE IRISH ROSE," TWO REELS, is a Maude Fealy film that you're lucky to get in the regular no-extra-charge service—put into that to boom her "Big Productions" with you. David Thompson, her leading man, will make all the girls fall in love with him as the witty Terence O'Moore, peasant and lover. Arthur Ellery is Thompson's rival for the Rose's hand, and Carey L. Hastings plays the fair one's mother. It's the finest Irish romance the films have shown in some time.

Friday, March 13th—NO RELEASE because of extra-reel subject of preceding release day.

Facts and Comments

THE motion picture as a spreader of publicity is not new, but an interesting situation which developed the other day in a small town in New Jersey is worth noting. A physician who lectured with the aid of motion picture exhibits on the evils of tuberculosis showed two beds and several cribs in one room. Just as he started to comment upon such conditions, a woman in the audience arose and threatened to smash his machine if he did not immediately "take the picture off the screen." It appeared that the doctor had gone into the woman's home and without her permission had taken such pictures of it as he thought he needed. The woman resented this intrusion upon her privacy, declaring that she was doing the best she could in her extreme poverty. The incident shows the all-pervading publicity of the motion picture, from which in these days none of us can hide.

FROM every part of the country THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD receives through the kindness of its friends and readers clippings from newspapers dealing with the motion picture in an editorial way. A good many of these editorial comments are entirely favorable, while others show ignorance or prejudice on the part of the writers. We have on numerous occasions complied with requests to comment upon the comments, and will no doubt often do so again. It would, however, be very appropriate and much to the point if some of our correspondents would address themselves directly to the offending newspapers. In the first place, a communication from a local reader is almost always printed near the editorial columns, and in the second place it is well to have the public realize that the exhibitor is an intelligent man well able to come to the defence of his profession. We have had some fine examples of exhibitors doing this very thing, and inspiring new thoughts in the editorial brains. Prejudice is not always malicious, and may be conquered by an appeal to reason.

LATEST reports from the Chicago battlefield would seem to indicate that the marble-headed Funkhouser has scruples about allowing the exhibition of "The Merchant of Venice" because some Hebrews might object to Shylock. At the recent performances of "The Merchant of Venice" on the legitimate stage, a famous English actor appearing in the part of Shylock, no inconsiderable portion of the audience were Jews, and the theater in which the play was performed was and is owned by Jews. Funkhouser has all the distressing earmarks of a medieval reincarnation. To follow his reasoning to its ultimate postulate we would have to put "Hamlet" on the "Index Expurgatorius" because it contains some unflattering comments on the social customs of the Danes. We suppose that a committee of Danes in Chicago calling upon Funkhouser to suppress "Hamlet" would be accommodated. This committee might be followed by a Moorish society to protest against "Othello." There are passages in "Macbeth" which may easily be construed as offensive to Norwegians, and so on, including almost everything the immortal bard has ever written. Another policeman in the New England States recently objected to the filming of "The Scarlet Letter" because it might tend to diminish the public respect for the clergy. We are seriously asking ourselves, in view of these facts, whether we are actually living under an Anglo-Saxon form of government, and whether the old American spirit is dead entirely. Had it not been for the action of The Mutual Film Company the chances are that the surrender to the censor fiends would have taken place before this. There is but one thing more offensive and disgusting than censorship, and that is the craven spirit of those who want to submit to it and who go abroad like certain characters in the Bible asking to be cleansed. Submission to censorship is a shameful surrender of manhood and our rights as Americans.

THE exhibitor who asks for an educational subject should be encouraged to the utmost. It is sheer folly to take extraordinary pains with an inquiry from an educational institution and to refer the exhibitor "to the nearest exchange." The exhibitor who wants an educational picture, nine times out of ten, does not want it for exhibition to his general audience, but for the purpose of attracting high school pupils, members of the Y. M. C. A. or the K. of C. He makes up a special program for these patrons and advertises the subjects for their special benefit. Now, it stands to reason that he is in this way doing the most valuable missionary work, which no other man in the industry has the opportunities of doing. Through such an exhibitor, teachers and men and women generally interested in educational work are for the first time in their lives made acquainted with the educative power of the kinematograph. An exhibitor who has the intelligence to perceive that there is a demand for good educational pictures and who has the ability to cater to this demand and to stimulate it is the best friend of the motion picture industry. It is incomprehensible to us how the exchanges and educational departments fail to grasp so obvious and important a fact.

Picturing Americans

By Louis Reeves Harrison

IS IT not time to tell the truth about our people?
It is high time to tell the truth about Americans.
Are there distinctive Americans?

Certain physical characteristics result, after a few generations, from climate and territorial influences; then our laws and customs have an effect on character, also form of government and methods of education, but our people present wide physical and mental differences according to culture, condition and race derivation, just as in all other civilizations, especially those outbreeding for vigor. But there are certain dominant traits in one section or another of the country which are rarely, if ever, accorded truthful representation in screen portrayals.

Do sections breed types?

Not the stale, time-worn, moth-eaten and mildewed types of theatricalism. "Character parts" have crept from the stage to the studio like a lot of highly-undesirable water bugs, harmless in a way, but repulsive to people of good common sense. They may get an occasional laugh among the rawest element of a mixed audience, but they offend more than they please, do more harm than good.

What true types do sections breed?

A man whose paternal ancestors were for ten generations of New England stock, whose maternal ancestors were almost exclusively from old Virginia families, whose early life was spent among people of the West, could easily answer from what he has felt within him and observed in his first environment, but it is not difficult for any intelligent and traveled American to recognize certain distinctive peculiarities in pure New England and Southern strains, and, almost as easily, their delightful combination in men and women of the West.

How are these three types defined?

They are very well defined by Hamilton Wright Mabie in his "American Ideals." He says, "New England was settled by men and women of resolute will, strong convictions, self-denying frugality and great industry." He remarks their independence of judgment, but that judgment was formulated more in a spirit of revolt against bitter conditions of existence, for it was very often as narrow as it was rebellious. They were a hard-fighting lot of Roundheads in the beginning, born reformers, eternally preaching, not only the gospel as they understood it, but every conceivable suggestion as to improvement of social and ethical conditions in general. They are even now slow to relinquish the idea that their special mission in life is to bring mankind to judgment. They evade direct questions and are often equivocal in statement, though almost as often honest in intent. Self-satisfaction is their marked characteristic. Their finest faith is that in education.

Is New England strength a Southern weakness?

Conditions of existence were less strenuous for the best class of people in the South; life in the open was more delightful; both climate and prodigality of nature contributed to an elegance and ease of living; people inclined to observe conventions rather than revolt against them; culture was more ideal and less practical, and a race of gracious manners and genial social relations was thus evolved. People inclined to belief in the inheritance of ability; opportunity went to the "first families," and a form of aristocracy arose that was not entirely in accord with the spirit of our country. The men were brave, and the women were fair, but their conservatism was not destined to endure in a land of restless progressive people.

How did these diverse types mix in the West?

Both sections left their impress to the advantage of the third section. New England faith in education resulted in a marvelous spread of common enlightenment throughout the West, and, although Western universities lack the endowments of wealth and time, they are broad in their scope and are shaping a passion for intellectual achievement. With no loss of energy, the Western people have many lovable Southern qualities, particularly that of hospitality. More democratic than the old Virginians, they are generous entertainers, and their manners are unconventionally cordial. Their politeness springs straight from kind hearts. Such ruffianism and crudeness of both character and manners is more exhibited in dear little old New York City than in any well-known section west of the Mississippi River. If we are to learn anything about ourselves from screen portrayals, let the truth be told.

Where are the cowboys to be found?

Hanging around Times Square booking offices, wearing spats on their pats and round-handled canes on their arms. Most of them are actor gentlemen, more at ease in dress suit and silk hat than in fringed trousers and sombrero. Whatever the cowboy may typify, it is not the big, broad-minded Westerner of ample educational opportunity, a developer by instinct and training, deeply concerned with giving women and children the freedom of thought and action they deserve, foremost in solving problems that hamper humanity's progress the world over. Realizing that there are all kinds of people in these three sections that are to be found in all three, the people of each section can be truthfully typified only by portraying certain recognizable dominant traits.

What are the distinctive racial traits?

Practical energy and consuming activity. The American is supposed to be interested in nothing but the Almighty Dollar, but this is because he loves to measure his strength against men of other nations in tremendous enterprises, such as the Panama Canal, because he likes to put forth his full strength in solving great problems. It is the same in international yacht races and athletic games—he plays the game less for the stakes than to win in competition. He does not count the cost where there is a question of sentiment involved, as in the Civil War, gives with a free hand to educational and other institutions created for the betterment of humanity. It is no easy matter to discriminate among men of intelligence born and raised in this or that part of the earth except in small, and often unimportant details of conduct. Men of New England and Old England closely resemble one another in their way of acting except in the almost childish forms still observed on those state occasions, British circus parades. Royalty caters to vanity with gaudy uniforms—that is part of the game to hold hereditary office. An American will enjoy the parade as much as any one, though he could not participate from lack of servility in his nature, but that sort of trumpery arouses in him amusement rather than respect. Moving pictures please him more because they represent splendid future opportunity rather than preservation of antiquated forms. He believes that they will prove a source of world inspiration—they are already educational in an attractive way, seem destined to play a part in the ultimate destiny of human beings and appeal strongly to the progressive tendency of the American mind. It is hard to draw obvious racial lines, but it is safe to show the American as deeply interested in one or another form of service to humanity. The trend of his political ideals seem to be towards "Peace on earth and good will to men."

The Cavemen

By W. Stephen Bush

SIX years ago I sat in a motion picture theater in a small city in Eastern Pennsylvania. The place was badly ventilated, successfully defying every effort at disinfecting, the pianist was thumping away "regardless," and the illustrated singer, like a cuckoo in a Swiss clock, came out with dreadful regularity and made the welkin suffer. The offering on the screen was a "Western" of the most pronounced type, one of those cowboy and Indian films for which in those days exhibitors would fight with fistic fierceness. When the cowboy riding through weird scenery would get near the robbed stage coach and cover the "road agent" with his gun, the audience, led by the feverish crowd of scrupulously unwashed boys in front, would cheer and bellow like a lynching mob in a melodrama. The place was crowded to the last inch. A new crowd was waiting in the lobby while the operator put on full speed. The crowd in the lobby stormed the place just as the innocent hero with a rope around his neck was rescued from his fate by Ouk-Ido, the Indian prairie flower.

I well remember the happy expression on the exhibitor's face as the nickels came down in torrents. "That's the stuff they want," he exclaimed complacently, "none of them high-brow fillums for me." In the short period of two years the exhibitor was a rich man, had become the possessor of an automobile and had lifted the mortgage on a handsome mansion, as mansions go in the mining districts. Recently I saw the exhibitor again, passing through the city for a friendly call. He had made some changes in his theater, chiefly at the request of the local authorities; he still had his worldly belongings intact, but he was far from being the old complacent exhibitor of six years ago. He could not understand the changes in the film business. He prided himself on always having stuck to one kind of service, and could not comprehend why the old-time rush was no longer in evidence. He had not seen a crowd waiting in the lobby in many a month. On Washington's Birthday he had taken in $76.00, compared to more than $200 two years before.

With all the delicacy at my command I intimated that he might have lost his grip. He scouted the idea, not with the vehemence which is often the forerunner of conversion, but with that peculiarly placid and vapid conceit which is wholly incurable.

"What!" he replied, pointing with pride to the evidences of his former success, "me losing my grip? There is nobody can teach me anything in this game: look at all the money I have made in the business!"

Is this man typical of a vanishing race of exhibitors? In other words, has the era of the cavemen in the motion picture industry passed, never to return? These are interesting questions, and to many men engaged in the exhibiting profession they are vital and pressing questions. I do not profess any prophetic gifts, but it does seem to me that the old order of things is rapidly passing away and that the men who, like the Bourbons of old, can neither forget nor learn, are doomed to gradual extinction.

Who, with an observant eye, can fail to perceive the upward trend of the day? Nothing can prevent the fullest development of all the possibilities of the motion picture. The progress in the nature of the subjects now filmed has been sudden and general, the multiple reel has opened up new fields and has given a new impulse to talent in all branches of the industry, there are more first class theaters in the country to-day devoted entirely to motion pictures, Broadway has more motion picture entertainments than ever before, new blood is flowing into the industry every day, artists of the highest type and world-wide reputation have joined the ranks of those who act in pictures, projection has improved and is constantly improving, music more than ever before and more skilfully than ever before is enlisted in proper presentation, all the foolish tricks of the quondam "moving picture parlor" are disappearing from view, educators the world over are awakening to the new medium of reaching and teaching the human mind, the prints on the sands of time are large enough to be seen by all except the vanishing race of the cavemen, a specimen of which I have attempted to describe.

Their audiences have felt the touch of progress and have consigned the "Western" to oblivion; they demand newer and better things of the motion picture, but the caveman is unable to respond. He laments the decay of the chase and the cheap melodrama, and has no use whatever for new-fangled notions in presenting his show. In less than a year he will find his occupation gone. There will be few regrets for this vanishing race.

In the new reign of quality now dawning all through the industry the sceptre will pass into the hands of the leaders and thinkers. We believe that their number is on the increase. We believe that the day of the stereotyped show has almost passed out. The future belongs to him who is capable of selecting the best pictures, wherever those pictures are to be found.

The reign of quality means that the despotism of quantity, with its deadly overproduction, must soon come to an end. For this reign of quality rather than quantity The Moving Picture World has contended as far back as 1908 and 1909. Other problems then occupied the dominant spirits in the industry, which needed regulation first of all. That this regulation, drastic and severe as it seemed at times, was an absolute necessity and really brought about the salvation of the industry, few students of affairs are now disposed to deny.

To-day we can swim without life-preservers, and by the free use of our arms and legs. It is much the better and surely the more graceful and artistic way of swimming.

The motion picture to-day is rapidly paralleling the legitimate stage. We know that our progress must move along these lines. The cavemen cannot march in this procession. They have had their sway. Too long have they set up as the arbiters of public taste, too long have they dominated the policy of producers. If the motion picture has survived them it happened in spite of the cavemen and not by any means through their assistance. The crude notions of showmanship developed in the dime museum, the shooting gallery, the skating rink, the penny arcade and the merry-go-rounds have long been serious handicaps to the development of quality in motion pictures. Too many producers have yielded to the short-sighted policy of playing down to the level of these cavemen. All of us have been guilty of accepting the cavemen's estimate of public taste. The caveman's vociferous and dogmatic "The Public Wants This" has too often stilled truer voices in our own hearts and has made cowards of us all.

Let us bid a long farewell to the vanishing race of the cavemen.

"For Napoleon and France"

An Ambitious Cines-Kleine Production in Six Parts.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

AFTER viewing the six-part photodrama by Societa Italiana Cines, entitled "For Napoleon and France," I was especially impressed by the absorbing interest that is created and retained through the entire 6,500 feet of film. Not for an instant did I feel the relaxation that usually ends in a yawn, one of the sure indications of faulty construction or the lack of a meaty story. The reels throughout are brimful of action. The martial atmosphere is intense, and the fortunes of the chief characters in the story are cleverly interwoven with realistic spectacular battles that were fought during the Napoleonic wars.

These battle scenes are supposed to be laid in France, Spain, Italy and Austria. The crowning engagement of the opposing forces, as shown in the films, is the battle of Austerlitz, where Napoleon shattered the Austrian forces, paving the way for the decisive battle of Jena that laid the German states at his feet. This filmed battle of Austerlitz shows great masses of troops and the famous charge of veterans on the Austrian center. We see shells falling and bursting among the ranks of the advancing force. One of these disables a brave little drummer boy, who is sounding the charge, and one's heart aches as the little fellow rises repeatedly from his knees, his tiny body wavering and tottering as he continues to sound the notes that are carrying his comrades to victory. It is more than a mere view of the carnage of war; we are right in the midst of it!

Several magnificent interiors are revealed during the telling of the filmed story. The reception and ball at the Paris home of Marshal Larive, Madame De Longueville's apartments, and the ball given by Marshal Marmont, are marvels in the line of photodramatic settings and costuming. These scenes are highly educational, in that they furnish us so vividly living pictures of men and women of fashion, their costumes and uniforms and the manners and customs that prevailed during the time of the First Consul.

Several of our old Cines friends, who have distinguished themselves by talented photodramatic art in former Cines-Kleine special features, have added to their laurels in this subject. Foremost among them is Sig. Anthony Novelli, who can count his American admirers by the hundreds of thousands, and who will always be remembered as the Vinitius of "Quo Vadis?" and as the Antony of "Antony and Cleopatra." In this instance he appears in the role of Captain Robert Larive. For my part, I think he fits better in this character than in any other in which I have viewed him. Another finely drawn character is that of Napoleon. Sig. George Cattaneo, who will be remembered for his great characterization of Nero in "Quo Vadis?" affects cleverly the well known personal peculiarities of the Little Corsican. In make-up he bears a striking resemblance to the generally accepted likenesses of the world's foremost general. Indeed, it is admitted that no other actor on the boards, of the present day, is so fitted, both physically and in conception of the character, to portray the first Napoleon to the life.

Madame De Longueville, a lady of Napoleon's court, who bears the stamp of a high bred adventuress, is in the hands of no less an artiste than Signora Giovanna Gonzales, whose Cleopatra is still winning favor throughout this continent. By reason of subtle characterization and for the magnificent costumes worn during the run of this photodrama, Signora Gonzales has placed herself still more firmly in public favor. Rina Larive, sister of the captain of that name, is most pleasingly represented by Signora Pina Menichelli. As the fearless vivandiere, Signora Menichelli—"Minnie Kelly," as some of her American admirers call her—is positively bewitching.

"For Napoleon and France" introduces another fine actor in Signor Philip Maieroni. His Marshal Larive is a model of character drawing. It is so strong in every way that it cannot fail to win general praise from the judicious. Another fine character part is the Count D'Arcy, of Signor Leonardo Vinci.

Many of the exterior views in these films are beautifully tinted. Several fine effects are produced in light olive hues.

The photography is in full keeping with the high class merit of the subject in the respects already referred to.

The Story.

The story cannot be classed as historical. It is a romance based on historical events that occurred during the life of the great Napoleon, the current of the story running through them, but also largely through the broader field of fiction.

Lieutenant Larive, a brave young officer, is stationed for a time near the home of a relative. His wife and two children—a boy and girl—set out to join him from a distant point. They are waylaid by bandits and Mrs. Larive is killed. The children, during the melee, wander out into the surrounding woods, where they are found by a kindhearted peasant and his wife, who adopt them.

The father is advised by his relative that his wife and children have been lost on the way. He immediately resigns his command to undertake a search, but he soon gives up in despair. Then he rejoins the army, and by reason of his dare-devil recklessness and bravery is raised to the rank of marshal. This occurred ten years after the loss of his wife and children.

Scene from "For Napoleon and France" (Cines-Kleine).

At this time Robert and Rina, his children, are living happily with the good peasants in their home, in southern France. At this time, also, Napoleon is in need of recruits and Robert enlists as a drummer boy. His first great experience in the field is at the famous battle of Austerlitz, where, by his courage, he enthuses the soldiers to persist in their charge on the Austrian center. Napoleon, from a commanding height, witnesses the heroic efforts of the wounded drummer boy. He visits the hospital in which Robert is being cared for, after the victory, and pins on his breast the coveted medal for bravery. Seven years later Robert is captain of a crack troop of cavalry; and, strange to say, his command is under Marshal Larive.

Captain Larive has become a hero, and is much sought after by women. Madame De Longueville, of Napoleon's court, shows him special favor, thereby incurring for Robert the hatred of an old admirer of that lady, Count D'Arcy. The adventuress goes so far as to attempt to induce Robert to disobey military orders; but his sister Rina saves him. Full of revenge because of Robert's renunciation, she joins hands with Count D'Arcy to bring about his downfall.

Robert is selected by Napoleon for an all important mission, on which great issues depend. Just as he is about to undertake it, he receives a letter from Madame De Longueville pleading that he call on her for the last time, as she is at the point of death. His sister warns him of the danger, and he pays temporary heed; but his way runs past the chateau of the adventuress and, yielding to the temptation, he calls. He finds the supposed dying woman in perfect health and denounces her. In a rage she calls D'Arcy and his adherents, and Robert is overcome and held prisoner. The precious papers in his possession are luckily overlooked by his enemies.

His sister Rina, strangely impressed that something is amiss, rides to the chateau and succeeds in attracting the attention of the prisoner. He drops the secret orders from his prison window, and she carries them to their destination. Through the loyalty of an old soldier of Napoleon, Robert escapes from the chateau, and rejoins his regiment. There he is arrested for desertion and is court-martialed. He is found guilty and is sentenced to death, Marshal Larive, his father, being president of the court.

By Rina's efforts Marshal Larive discovers that Robert and Rina are his long lost children, and through the clemency of Napoleon, Robert is pardoned.

This special Cines-Kleine subject will be handled similarly to "Quo Vadis?" and "The Last Days of Pompeii." It will be given its first public presentations on or about March 15.

OPENING OF U. S. THEATER, DENVER.

The United States Theater, Denver, was opened February 12, under the auspices of two leading local newspapers. Ten thousand people attended on the opening day, it is said. Nine presentations were given.

Lubin's "Lion and the Mouse," the chief feature of the program, made a big hit. Another pleasing feature was a fine orchestra. There was no delay between the reels of the pictures shown, two picture machines being installed in the operating room.

The United States is fireproof and the very latest ventilating system has been provided. Attractive rest rooms for women, equipped with lounges and chairs, were much appreciated by the crowds of visitors at the opening.

A special officer was in constant attendance during the day, and his services will be retained by the management to insure the privacy of lady patrons.

The theater is owned by a stock company, the members being nearly all Denverites. J. J. McClusky is manager. Licensed programs are used. The seating capacity is 1,200.

TO CONDUCT A CIRCUIT OF THEATERS.

The Burke Amusement Co., Kenosha, Wis., will conduct a number of picture houses in Kenosha, Milwaukee, Beloit and other Wisconsin cities and towns. The incorporators of the company are Walter M. Burke, B. Leutrity, and William M. Meyer. The charter of the company entitles the company to enter into anything theatrical.

"His Comrade's Wife"

An Edison One-Reel Drama, Released Through the General Film Company.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A BEAUTIFULLY presented story, one of the kind that made moving pictures popular before attenuated features put in an appearance. The one reel "His Comrade's Wife," is replete with interest—it was all there was to tell and no attempt was made to stretch it with incongruous matter. This may sound inconsistent from one who has advocated feature plays for many years, but it is not. The feature is the novel, the one-reel is the short story—that is about as far as the average scenario writer has figured it out. There are, however, decided points of difference besides those of length between the short story and the novel, between the single-reel and the five-reel screen portrayal, that need not be discussed here, that director Ridgely possibly appreciated in keeping his production within its natural limitations.

Scene from "His Comrade's Wife" (Edison).

Ridgely's love of the beautiful, manifest ever in his backgrounds, is so great that he is liable to be misled by it into the presentation of attractive scenes to the detriment of characterization and plot, but he has nicely adjusted the essentials in "His Comrade's Wife." He starts well by visualizing the stolid, mind-destroying grief of a young widow who has suddenly idealized her husband, an officer of the British army in Africa, by believing that he died in glorious self-sacrifice, a veritable hero. Whether or not she had appreciated him in life, she is on the verge of losing her sanity from the combined bitterness of sorrow and regret. Mabel Trunelle succeeds in picturing this mental condition without any straining for effect.

A brother officer, impersonated by Richard Tucker, who had been with her husband's detachment, who has done all in his power to comfort and help the unhappy widow, finds himself confronted with a grave problem. The unhappy woman's regrets can be relieved by telling the truth about her husband—he did not die like a hero—but the spell of misery under which she is laboring is broken by a child, whose sympathies bring her the relief of tears. The brother officer decides to let her preserve her illusion.

He reaches this decision in meditation over his pipe, and the true story of the husband's rank cowardice, resulting in his death, and the actual heroism of his modest brother officer, the one who survived a series of deadly perils in his ride for reinforcements and disclaimed the credit he deserved, is reviewed in some lively scenes. Learning from the coward's own servant that he has been killed in trying to save himself, the brave comrade takes the duty on himself and performs it, thereby saving his detachment. On his ride back to the lines he is captured by a band of Zulus, bound to a stake and left to writhe in very realistic flames when the natives are attacked by the reinforcements. When he at last reaches the main division of the army, he finds that the coward has been credited with the mission he executed.

He let it go at that for the wife's sake. He does not undeceive her during an intimate relation that follows, but two years later, while in her company, the old servant reappears and gives credit where credit is due. The cast of this little drama is remarkable and the acting is flawless.

"The Battle in the Clouds"

Three Reels—Apex Films.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE stolen papers, fruitful source next to the stolen jewels of conventional melodrama, constitute the head and front and plot of this feature. Do not run away with the idea, however, that this Apex is a conventional drama. It is far more than that and far better. In the conventional melodrama the stolen papers rarely got further than the hollow tree at the old mill, but here the battle rages first on earth and then as the title indicates in the sky.

This offering is highly spiced with pieces of that sensationalism, which in the opinion of many exhibitors, the public cry for. It has some artistic merit as witness the fine settings and the good acting. It is chiefly notable, however, for hairbreadth escapes, blood-curdling races between train and auto and the "battle in the clouds." The stolen papers, having passed into the hands of a precious and accomplished set of modern villains, are hunted in the grounds and rooms of a fashionable hotel with a wonderful esplanade. They are searched for in high-powered automobiles and finally pursued into the upper regions.

Along toward the middle of the third reel it looks bad for the rightful owners of the purloined valuable papers. The villains who in the modern feature seem fond of traveling in company, have secured a good start and are sailing toward the empyrean with evident skill and satisfaction. The detective sees them soaring above and grits his teeth in disappointment, figuratively if not literally. At this moment he runs across a balloon being made ready for an ascent. He offers a thousand dollars for the immediate use of the balloon. When told that this is impossible because it will take at least an hour to attach the basket, he tells the managers of the ascent, that he will use his horse in place of the basket, and a moment later the balloon, with the horse acting as a steadier, is seen coursing slowly through the air. It is a thrilling moment, no matter how sorry you may feel for the horse.

While at times the plot seems to become slightly obscured, there is constant movement in the feature and the story carries one along in wonder and interest. The direction of the feature was evidently in competent hands, the tense situations and the frequent climaxes were brought about in a most convincing manner. A word of special praise is due to the superb photography of the feature. Altogether this feature hits the taste of many motion picture patrons and will strengthen many a program. It is absolutely free from the slightest objection on moral grounds even in the eyes of the severest of judges.

PURCHASES THEATER.

W. S. Weston, of Webster City, Ia., has purchased the Princess moving picture theater at Ames, Ia., of Sears, Narvis & Hardin. Associated with Mr. Weston is Col. N. P. Hiatt, of Webster City, manager of the Orpheum theater, that city.

BUILDING NEW THEATER AT FULTON, N. Y.

Fitzer Bros. are building a moving picture theater at Fulton, N. Y., to seat 820, which will cost about $22,000. It is expected that this new house will be opened in a few months. Fitzer Bros. are doing a good business with the Happy-Hour moving picture theater opened in Fulton in last September.

"The Sky Monster."

Four-Reel German Subject Shown at Republic Marks Opening of Universal Feature Service.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Universal Film Manufacturing Company is showing at the Republic Theater a four-part subject "made in Germany," but not under the direction of the exhibiting company. The picture is lacking in those elements which constitute a great picture—first and chiefest of all, in dramatic quality. Then, again, through the title, a part of the story is laid in New York where as a matter of fact the entire production was made in Europe and probably in Germany only. The locations ascribed to New York — the streets, the buildings, the steamship pier—will jar the American eye; plainly they are of the other side of the water. The foreign atmosphere is so illusion destroying that it handicaps the picture beyond repair. Of American atmosphere there is not a trace.

The story is loosely woven around a Zeppelin airship, said to be the only one which has been really a success. The craft appearing in the picture is described as having covered 8,000 miles. Certainly she is a stately sailing flyer. There are many views of the great cigar-shaped affair, sometimes above the land but more frequently over a smooth sea. There are some pictures taken from the Zeppelin, a few showing the faces of two of the principals. There are two views that stand out. One is of the great craft sailing in a subdued light high over the water and at such a distance away as also to include in the field of the lens the white-sailed craft on the sea below. The other is a sharply defined photograph of the great Imperator under steam as the airship passes several hundred feet above her decks.

Two men, one young, the other considerably older, are sitting in a New York restaurant. The older is smitten with a woman diner. He meets her and learns she is on her way to take a steamer en route to Berlin to appear in a picture—an unusual proceeding surely. The old gallant escorts the charmer to the pier in his machine. He induces her to write her name on the window of his car with a diamond he furnishes. On the pier a drunken laborer smashes a plank through the glass, destroying the writing. Back in his club, disconsolate, the man is chided by Parker, his friend, who tells him he is going to take a trip to Europe in his airship and that he will bring back the woman with him—and in ten days' time.

Parker arrives in Berlin three days later—we see the aircraft make the landing. Two days following he visits the studio and finds Miss Bell, but is thrown out. That evening Parker through his inseparable monocle sees the actress at supper with her director. His efforts to talk with her fail. She writes him she will see him the next night at a theater in St. Petersburg. There he travels in his airship. From a box he sees the dancer in a good light effect. There is a cossack officer in the same box who also admires the dancer. Later in a dance hall of the fashionable sort Parker sends a five-pound note to the orchestra leader with a request that he play an American turkey-trot. With the aid of the music he lures the woman from the Russian. After she partakes of a drink she becomes unconscious and Parker has her hurried into an automobile, then to the shore, into a boat, and lifted into the airship. The woman does not recover consciousness until she is safely aboard the flyer — hardly an ordinary fainting spell, as the title would have us believe.

The only near thrill in the picture is the pursuit by the cossack officer, but the illusion is shortly dispelled by the ability of a troop of horses to keep up with the machine. Then, again, the arrival of the cavalcade is so badly timed that the animals have to be turned around after they reach the water's edge to avoid overtaking the abductor and his prisoner. On board the aircraft the lady is peevish at first and refuses to be sociable, but long before New York is reached she relents. Parker arrives at the club at the appointed minute a la Phileas Fogg, and all ends happily—that is, except for the old beau, who finally yields his singular claim on the damoiselle and gives his blessing to the lovers.

The setting of the dance hall is of unusual size and well put on. The restaurant and club scenes are good examples of staging. The photography is clear, barring the presence of occasional static. The acting is indifferent; in the case of the captain of the aircraft noticeably poor. When the flyer runs out of gasoline and it is necessary to lighten ship we get a glimpse of what may on the other side pass for comedy; the jettisoning by the cabin boy of the bit of toilet furnishing will by most picture patrons be classified as vulgarity.

"The Sky Monster" is the first release of the Universal's special feature department. Those so far announced to follow it are from the company's own studios.

"The Diamonds of Destiny."

Four Reels—Midgar Features.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS second offering of the Imperator brand of films, released through the Midgar features, has, like its predecessor, one great merit, which covers many a defect: it actually carries a plot, in which adults, unaccompanied by children may take an interest. Here and there the joining of the scenes by the director may lack smoothness, for a complete dove-tailing of events in detective stories is extremely rare, but the logic of events is present from the opening scene to the last. The climax is powerful. It is unexpected and artistically as well as ethically the best and strongest denouement that I have seen in many a day.

A strangely scented woman's glove is the only clue to a most mysterious diamond robbery. A detective is engaged to solve the mystery and he succeeds in picking up a somewhat doubtful trail, which leads him to a French seaside resort. Here he becomes acquainted with a young woman. He notices the same strange perfume which he had discovered in the glove given him as his only clue by the victimized jeweler. He hesitates. The woman whom his judgment as an investigator of crime tends to connect with the commission of the robbery, has become dear to him and he is loath to believe that he is actually on the trail of the criminal. Remembering his duty, however, he follows up the clue and soon discovers that the woman's brother is in receipt of telegrams of warning addressed to him from London. His suspicion finally becomes a certainty when the woman and her brother hurriedly leave the hotel. He gives chase immediately and now follow a series of hairbreadth escapes by the thief and deeds of extraordinary daring by the pursuer. The thief is escaping from the detective in a fast motor boat. The detective leaps from a bridge into the river, enlists the aid of another motor boat and after a stern chase captures the thief. The latter is turned over to the authorities after the diamond has been recovered. The sister, who had been forced by the guilty brother to aid him in his criminal acts, returns the love of the detective and at his command retires to her room to be ready for surrender to the police whenever the detective demands it. The latter is struggling with his love for the woman and hesitates to arrest her, when she tells him that he need not fear, for she has taken poison, realizing that she cannot marry the detective, stained as she deems herself with the same guilt which landed her brother in prison. It is a tragic and affecting ending, but the only ending which was logically possible.

Rarely have I seen better photography. The settings are of the best, the acting on the whole satisfactory. There was now and then a slight tendency to overacting, but the principal characters were portrayed quite convincingly.

MINING TOWN GETS PICTURE HOUSE.

In the mining town of Freeland, Pa., which has a population of 7,000, a picture theater has been opened by Refowich Bros. The name of the new house is the Refowich, and it cost $40,000 to build. It has a seating capacity of 800, 500 on the parquette floor and the balance on the balcony. Mutual and General Film Company service is used. The admission prices are 5 and 10 cents.

"The Billionaire."

A Creditable K & E Feature Released by the General Film Company.

Reviewed by Harry W. DeLong.

THIS photoplay is offered to the public under the brand of Klaw & Erlanger, being one of their early releases. It is a three-reel offering of a sensational, farcical comedy nature. John Doe, a cognomen familiar to newspaper readers, especially of the police news department, is a billionaire. How he contracted the disease is not clearly visualized. If you have no other theory to expound we will consider it was heredity that forced him to indulge in champagne baths with the assistance of several valets of different nationalities. Having nothing better to do he also looked over his private gymnasium and lifted a dumb-bell and squinted at an Indian club. An inspiration suddenly seizes him and he concludes to go abroad. Packing his grip full of yellow-backed money with a comedy valet as custodian of the exchequer, he takes the suite de luxe on a real steamer and proceeds to make the passengers and crew sit up and take notice.

About this time the Peppercorn family loom into view, boarding the same steamer, pa, ma, and daughter. Then the trouble begins to ooze through the plot and help along with the comedy. In the course of time our Billionaire strikes Nice, as do the Peppercorn family. Our rapid-fire billionaire proceeds to burn up daylight and bright light in a most extravagant manner. In fact his supply of cash appears so unlimited that the proprietor fires him out unceremoniously, for fear he will "bust" the bank. He is forced to repeat the fire-out several times before it takes. He stakes all the losers possible for him to find, especially the ladies—one particularly. Finally he gets into an altercation and presenting his card to a dozen or more gentlemen has as many duels on his hands at daybreak the next morning. The crowd appearing appalls him and he hikes 'cross country. He fortunately encounters an aeroplane about to arise and bribes the airman to give him a boost, thus escaping his opponents by a close call. His cashier falls several hundred feet, but alighting on the wad breaks only one bill. In the second part he attends several cabaret shows and discovers a wonder in a girl, Pansy, whom he befriends.

Later he starts for home, taking her with him, after engaging a victorious pugilist at a ring contest as his bodyguard, to protect him from a bloodthirsty Frenchman who has found his card and photograph in the possession of his wife (the lady to whom he gave the money at Nice), and who follows him to America. On his leaving for America he sends a wireless to his office manager, "Have a theater built and ready to open on my arrival —six days—get busy." He arrives on time and the theater has been completed. The company is engaged, rehearsed, and the show opens to a large and fashionable audience.

During the performance the stage hands, orchestra and chorus strike because John Doe has no union card, and he is forced to call upon volunteers from the audience to finish out the show. At the conclusion of the performance he purchases several papers from a newsboy to read the criticisms and in payment for the papers gives him the theater and he and Pansy take a taxi for the minister's, in company with the wad-holder and bodyguard. This picture play was written and produced evidently for laugh-producing purposes and, curiously, it fulfills its mission. It is produced in a first-class manner, in every respect.

H. B. WARNER TO PLAY FOR LASKY.

The activities of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, in gathering in important stars and plays, is resulting in the securing of some of the foremost stage stars accepting motion picture engagements. Announcement is made that the Lasky organization has garnered Henry B. Warner to appear in his most recent success, "The Ghost Breaker," and another prominent star to appear in "The Man On the Box."

Mr. Warner played for two seasons in "The Ghost Breaker," one of which was spent at the Lyceum Theater, New York, and another on the road. The play has never been done in stock and this more than anything else appealed to the Lasky Company, the officers of which endeavor to secure recognized stage successes for presentation in motion pictures before they have outlived their usefulness on the stock stage.

By special arrangement with Bobbs-Merrill Company, "The Man On the Box" will be produced with a prominent juvenile man in the leading role, now playing a star part in a Broadway success, and who has requested that his name be withheld until the Broadway engagement ends.

"Brewster's Millions" will be the next release of the Lasky Company and is now in an almost completed stage. It is being made at the Lasky Studios, Hollywood, Calif., under the direction of Cecil B. DeMille and Oscar Apfel, and will be a five-reel picture.

Hite Engages Three.

Miss Fan Bourke in Character.

WHILE reports of "cutting companies" and "retrenching" floats all around the producing end of the industry, C. J. Hite recently signed three more leading people for the Thanhouser Company. They are Morris Foster, for general leading work; Arthur Bower, for character leads, and Fan Bourke for comedy leads. In conformance with the usual Thanhouser policy, it is the first time in pictures for all three. That is, in pictures this side the water —Bower worked for a European studio some years ago. Morris Foster's career started in 1903 at the Central Theater, San Francisco, where Lawrence Griffith was "heavy man" at an ordinary salary and didn't dream of moving pictures. Later Foster was leading man in a stock company at the Court, Wheeling, W. Va., where Marguerite Snow, the present Thanhouser star, was his leading woman. Other stock company engagements were in the famous Forepaugh organization at Indianapolis and the Harry Davis, Pittsburgh. Foster served with Henrietta Crossman and last year with Olive Windham in "What Happened to Mary." Miss Fan Bourke is a comedienne whose stage talents have been exploited by Charles Dillingham, Cecil De Mille and the late Henry B. Harris at various times. Arthur Bower played at the Great Northern Film Studios in Denmark some years ago, but Thanhouser is his first American picture engagement. He made a noise a few years ago by fine work in the original "Merry Widow" company. One thousand and eight performances in this piece was his record. Henry W. Savage, who produced the "Widow," had Bower under his management seven consecutive years.

Morris Foster.

W. I. CHERRY GETS LASKY FEATURES.

W. I. Cherry, president of the Southern Feature Film Association, with offices at Dallas, New Orleans and Atlanta, and controlling numerous features throughout the various Southern States, contracted last week for the entire output of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company for Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee, Texas, Arkansas, Oklahoma and the Canal Zone, and will make the first release of a Lasky production next week in "The Squaw Man," in which Dustin Farnum makes such a masterful success. Contracts for the large territory outlined above were closed ten minutes after the picture was shown in private at the Longacre Theater.

"Fantomas, the Crook Detective."

The Fourth of the Gaumont's Famous Series Is an Exciting and Exceptionally Well Produced Play.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Gaumont Company's fourth series of "Fantomas, the Crook Detective," is an unusually good production. One of the factors of the several that stand out is the work of those usually described as "extras," or, in other words, the humbler members of the cast, which, by the way, is a very large one. Victor Navarre, who plays Fantomas and three other characters, is skillful and convincing. James Breon, who portrays Detective Inspector Juve, is a fine type of policeman, as he is a most competent actor. Mme. Renee Carl, who has appeared in earlier "Fantomas" pictures, has a new role in this one, that of the Grand Duchess. She plays the grand dame as easily and gracefully as she does the peasant naturally. The acting is noteworthy.

Scene from "Fantomas" (Gaumont).

There is a note of suspense running throughout the four reels. In the first part there is a thrilling scene when the two apaches who have killed the bank messenger come down stairs to the rooms of Father Moche and very properly accuse him of the robbery of the wallet they had intended to secure. The facility with which the disguised and crooked detective takes from the desperate apache the knife will more than interest. It will stir. The events in the cellar, where the newspaper man, hiding in a large cask, through the bunghole advises the bound detective, are highly exciting, as also is the rounding up of the band of thieves.

While there is a bit of life in the underworld in this interesting story the major part of it is of people of position. There is a reception and masked costume dance at the mansion of the grand duchess which is exceptionally well staged and directed. It is here that there are developed effective dramatic situations.

The picture will hold an audience of any degree.

KALEM BOOKING "FROM MANGER TO THE CROSS" DIRECT.

Because of the many inquiries received by Kalem within the last few weeks relative to the booking of its superb, five-part masterpiece "From Manger to the Cross," that company has just issued an announcement to the effect that it is now booking this great production direct in all states, with the exception of the following:

Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Minnesota, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Rhode Island and West Virginia.

"From Manger to the Cross," is without doubt, the greatest production of all times and has been indorsed by clergy and laity the world over. Exhibitors, with the exception of those situated in the states mentioned above, who wish to secure this extraordinary attraction, should communicate with Kalem direct.

FAMOUS PLAYERS RETURN FROM CUBA.

The last few members of the company that recently went to Cuba for the Famous Players Film Company, and who remained there under the direction of J. Searle Dawley after Daniel Frohman, Madame Kalich and her supporting company left the island, have returned to New York. Among the last home-comers was Laura Sawyer.

Hugo Amberg Goes to Germany.

WITH a view of putting the publicity department maintained in Germany, Austria and Denmark by the Universal on the same efficient and progressive basis which characterizes the company's American offices, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company are sending to Germany Hugo Amberg, a young Americanized German, who had a brilliant career in the local film game.

Hugo Amberg.

Mr. Amberg sailed on the American of the Hamburg-American Line, February 19th. On arriving in Hamburg, Germany, he will go direct to the company's offices in Berlin, where he will immediately take over the publicity department, which includes the getting out of the German edition of the Universal Weekly. He will make his home in that country indefinitely.

It was a question for some time in the minds of the Universal officials as to whether it would not be more advisable to seek out a competent man on the ground for the position. But, after investigation, it was found that such a man would be most difficult to secure; a man who combined original ideas with American progressiveness was best found in this country. The choice of Mr. Amberg, the company feels, was a happy one, for, while he is German himself, having been born and raised in that country, understanding the German customs and temperament, he is alive to the most improved American methods of publicity and advertising.

Mr. Amberg came to this country some five years ago. He first found his way into the motion picture field as a road man for Carl Laemmle's exchange in Chicago. This experience brought him into close touch with exhibitors and instilled a sympathy for and an understanding of them. Following this, he came into the office to take charge of the correspondence and advertising departments. During the three years connected with President Laemmle's interests, he has studied the film business from every angle. He goes to his new field with fresh ideas, and if German conservation can assimilate the progressiveness found in the American market, the trade may safely look for some changes and innovations.

VANOSCOPE COMPANY IN LITIGATION.

William J. Robinson, a British subject, has brought suit against Vanoscope Company and Lewes C. Van Riper, said to be the inventor of the Vanoscope. Robinson claims that he both financed and promoted the enterprise and that there is due to him for loans and services the sum of $2,000,000. Robinson, until recently, was president of the company and claims to have been induced to relinquish his office through the efforts of Van Riper. The action has been brought in one of the Federal Courts in New York State. Robinson now has changed his residence from New York to Chicago.

THEATER CHANGES HANDS.

The Musee, a moving picture theater at Nevada, Ohio, has been sold, by Ed. McLaughlin, to Sponseller & Bachr. The house is situated on Main Street, which is the principal thoroughfare of the town. Besides operating the picture theater, the managers will also be factors in the Electric Wire and Supply Co., of Nevada.

"King Charles."

Manufacturers' Film Agency—Four Reels.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature deals with the adventures of Charles II of England, between the battle of Worcester and the escape of the king from the pursuit of the Cromwellian soldiers.

The very choice of a subject of this character deserves commendation. While the filming itself is not free from crudities and lack of detail the feature is possessed of considerable merit; it was planned and executed on a fairly ambitious scale. The director had the benefit of a well-known historical novel to guide him and he used his advantage to the utmost. The exterior settings are almost without exception good, while the interiors do not always come up to expectations. The acting leaves little to be desired, the impersonation of the Merry Monarch may at times seem somewhat exaggerated, but there is warrant in history and tradition for most of it. The characters of Cavaliers and Roundheads are drawn substantially correct, though the drinking propensities of the Royalists seem unduly exaggerated. The film is rich in episode. The hiding of the king in the famous Boscobel oak, his narrow escapes from the followers of Cromwell, the instances of loyalty and devotion on the part of his subjects, his gallantry, always so close to licentiousness, his personal charm of manner are portrayed with a laudable degree of accuracy. His escape to the boat which bore him to France and safety was a fine piece of realism and likewise the reentry of the royal wanderer into the city of London.

A pretty love story is interwoven with the historical tale and gives an additional element of interest to the film. The ending is very satisfactory.

The costumes both of the Puritans and the Cavaliers had evidently been chosen with great and intelligent care, the armor and the weapons of the soldiers were historically correct and altogether there was an atmosphere of the Cromwellian days which gave the feature one of its principal points of merit.

The title is too vague and indefinable. There are two kings of the name of Charles in English history; both were men of uncommon type and both stood in the center of great events. There are many kings of the same name in the history of other lands and it would be well to have the title make it plain that this feature deals with Charles the Second, the Merry Monarch.

TO BUILD ANOTHER THEATER.

The Electra Theater Company, Electra, Texas, owners of the Dixie and Sunner theaters and the White City Airdome, are proposing to build another picture house in Electra. The dimensions of the proposed house are 50 x 140 feet, and will cost about $10,000. The seating capacity will be 700. The company would like to hear from architects, designers, etc.

MANHATTAN FEATURE FILM CO. MOVES.

The Manhattan Feature Film Co., of 341 Fifth Ave., New York, has moved to larger offices in the New Centre Building, 41 West 32nd Street. Increase in business necessitated the move. Joseph E. Arnett is the general manager of this concern.

Edward O'Connor.

IF THERE is any one man whose mere stepping into a photoplay is a signal for a ripple of laughter, he is Edward O'Connor. This jovial Edison player has the gift of humor so phenomenally developed that he might well be accused of having the Blarney stone as his birthstone, instead of one of the commoner gems. Of course, he was born in Dublin — no other city in the auld country could boast so Irish an Irishman, except, perhaps, Cork. After spending his childhood in Lancashire, England, he came to the United States when still very young.

Edward O'Connor.

He made his first professional appearance in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" — not as little Eva. Since that time he has devoted himself to the theatrical profession exclusively, his activities including Shakespeare, burlesque, melodrama, comedy, vaudeville, repertoire, farce, extravaganza, comic opera, and several stock engagements. Though he is a comedian, born and bred, he has played a great many serious roles, among them the ghost in "Hamlet." During a stock engagement in Denver he played the leading heavy parts, such as Jaques in "The Two Orphans," Count de Morney in "The Celebrated Case" and others.

Among the notables with whom he has appeared during his stage career are McKee Rankin, Sidney Drew, Kathryn Kidder, Andrew Mack and the Rogers Brothers. He has played hundreds of parts during his long theatrical career, and not a few of them have been created by him. Mendoza in "Mlle Fifi," Doxey in Jacob Litt's "Sporting Life," Mazey in William Gillette's "A Legal Wreck," O'Donovan Duff in "Two Old Cronies," in which he was featured; Sheridan in "Tom Moore" with Andrew Mack, Bat Lynch in "The Rogers Brothers, in Ireland," and Harrigan in George Cohan's "Fifty Miles from Boston" are a few of the more prominent parts which he has presented.

Since becoming an Edison player, O'Connor has turned his attention entirely to comedy, appearing in such notable comic films as "Hogan's Alley," "The Embarrassment of Riches," "A Pair of Foils," "He Would Fix Things," "Bill's Career as Butler," "His First Performance," and "A Pious Undertaking." "A Night Out" shows O'Connor in his element.

If there is a laugh in any story, O'Connor can bring it out. It makes no difference whether he is a janitor or a burlesque nobleman, his own irrepressible individuality brings to the surface every particle of humor in the scene. The secret of his success lies in the fact that he fairly enjoys his work. Next to smoking his pipe he knows nothing more enjoyable than a good comedy scene. If the pipe figures in the scene, he can ask nothing more.

O'Connor has won a well-deserved place among the foremost funny men of photoplaydom. His popularity with the public is steadily growing and he numbers his loyal friends to-day by the thousands.

OBTAINING MONEY UNDER FALSE PRETENSES.

Users of Power's Cameragraphs in certain sections of the south and middle west have been imposed upon by parties representing themselves to be demonstrators for the Nicholas Power Company, by passing worthless checks, and in several instances large advances were made these individuals by various managers of motion picture theaters as well as by proprietors of hotels. The Nicholas Power Company requests its friends throughout the country to refrain from furnishing funds or cashing checks for anyone purporting to be a representative of that company unless the individuals desiring to be so favored are personally known to them to be such.

Jewish Religious Subject.

Kalem and Jewish Organization Co-operate on a Drama of the Feast of the Passover.

What is undoubtedly the most important contribution to the films which depict racial customs is "A Passover Miracle," recently completed by Kalem, and scheduled for release, Monday, March 30th.

"A Passover Miracle" shows with great fidelity the Feast of the Passover, the Hebrew holy day which commemorates the flight of the Children of Israel from Egypt.

Unusual interest is attached to this Kalem production, in that it has the sanction of the Bureau of Education of the Jewish Community. In fact, it represents the joint efforts of this Jewish organization and Kalem.

Sometime ago, Benjamin Barondess, a well-known photo-playwright and student, submitted the scenario of the Passover feature to Kalem Company. In discussing the feasibility of producing this drama, it was decided to broach the subject to the Bureau of Education of the Jewish Community and ascertain as to whether the Jewish element would object to the portrayal of one of their sacred feasts upon the screen.

Far from taking a negative stand, the organization indorsed the subject, declaring that it would enlighten the people at large as to the significance of the Feast of the Passover. The Bureau of Education went further and in the correspondence which ensued, Dr. S. Benderly, director of the Bureau, which is composed of the leading Jews in New York, made the following suggestion: "I would suggest that you arrange with our Mr. Maximon not only to be present when you produce the religious scenes, but, if possible, to watch the production of the entire scenario. * * * Here and there in a scenario, there may be scenes which to you would seem independent of any religious element, which, however, might require a better knowledge of Jewish mass psychology than you probably have at your disposal in your studio."

This suggestion was promptly acted upon and Mr. Maximon was on hand throughout the period these scenes were made. Furthermore, to secure the proper interpretation of the leading roles, eminent Jewish actors were employed. One of these, Henri Leone, was cast for the role of "Joseph Ratkowitz," the patriarchal orthodox Jew who is the father of "Sam," a boy who forsakes his humble family because he is ashamed of them. The latter role was played by Samuel Lowett. These performers, by virtue of their knowledge of the usages of their race, imbued the production with a Hebrew atmosphere such as has never before been attained in motion pictures.

"A Passover Miracle" will be issued at a particularly timely season, inasmuch as the Feast of the Passover, occurs at sundown, Friday, April 10th, ten days after the drama is released. The subject is dealt with in a spirit of reverence that is sure to appeal to Jewish communities everywhere. It reveals the Passover as a celebration of thanksgiving because of the deliverance of the Children of Israel from Egyptian bondage. It is an occasion when the most humble member of the race can enter the home of the proudest and sit at the feast table, a welcome and honored guest.

The story woven about the Feast of Passover is one of rare beauty. Briefly, it tells of how Sam, the son of Ratkowitz, leaves home because he is ashamed of his humble family. This, despite the fact they had slaved to send him through medical college. The major portion of his tuition fees had been furnished by Lena, an adopted sister, to whom he is betrothed.

A flashy stenographer is the cause of the trouble. This girl, however, throws Sam over for another man who is plentifully supplied with money. Sam eventually comes back to his father's home, but hesitates to enter the door. Inside, the father and Lena are celebrating a rather desolate Passover.

Then comes the moment when the old man, in accordance with the ancient Hebrew ceremony, chants "Let all who are hungry enter and eat hereof; and all who are needy come and celebrate the Passover." Lena opens the door, which according to custom admits Elijah, the Lord's messenger of comfort and peace, who is supposed to visit every Jewish home and taste of the wine. Sam is discovered. The climax which follows shows the wayward boy back in the home of his father.

"The Three Musketeers."

Anglo-American Film Corporation Opens Old New York Theater With Famous Story In Picture Form.

Reviewed by Harry W. DeLong.

THE Anglo-American Film Corporation having leased the New York Theater, Broadway and Forty-fifth Street, opened it Friday night, with a private performance to invited guests, as a photoplay theater. The attraction offered was "The Three Musketeers," an adaptation of Alexander Dumas's romantic novel of the same title. The audience was made up of professional people and their friends, for the most part, and was a very fashionable one, also a very enthusiastic one. The actors comprised in the cast in the picture were all French stars from various Paris theaters. M. Cande, of the Theater Vaudeville, as Porthos, and Mlle. Nellie Cormon, of the Theater du Gymnase, had the role of Milady de Winter. Others in the cast are: M. Dehelly, of the Theater de la Comedie Francais, as Le Chevalier D'Artagnan; M. Phillipe Garnier, of the Theater de la Comedie Francais, as Le Cardinal Richelieu; M. Vibert, of the Theater de l'Antoine, as Athos; Mlle. Aimee de Raynal, of the Theater de la Comedie Royale, as La Reine Anne; Mlle. Guizelle, of the Theater de l'Athence, as Constance Bonacieux; M. Marquet, of the Theater de l'Odeon, as Louis XIII; M. Stellid, of the Theater Apollo, as Aramis.

This magnificent pictureplay, said to have cost upward of $100,000, consists of 279 scenes and is the acme of film art. The photography could not be improved upon. The costuming and scenic environments are perfect in every detail and the direction is marvellous. All combine to give it the atmosphere with which the author surrounded his characters in his novel. The plot deviates somewhat from the stage dramatization, but is held as close to the original as possible in the silent drama.

"The Three Musketeers" is so well known that only a mere sketch of the plot is necessary. Charlotte Backson, an adventuress, is arrested for theft and branded with the disgraceful fleur-de-lys and later poses as Milady de Winter. She marries the Comte de Ferre, who, by accident, discovers the brand on her shoulder, he shoots her and leaves her for dead. She recovers and escapes to England where she contracts a second marriage with Lord Winter. She becomes the confidant of the Duke of Buckingham, who is in love with the Queen of France. She undertakes to deliver a message from him to the Queen. As one of the spies of Cardinal Richelieu, the enemy of the Queen, she delivers the secret to him instead. The Comte, in the meanwhile, has joined the King's musketeers, under the name of Athos. With him are his three inseparable friends, Aramis, Porthos, and D'Artagnan. The four friends plot against the Cardinal. The Queen prospers, and Milady, the spy, is caught and put to death by the musketeers, but not before she has poisoned D'Artagnan's sweetheart, Madame Bonacieux.

The New York Theater has been transformed for the occasion, which makes it one of the largest and best equipped, devoted to high-class pictures in the city. An innovation has been introduced in the way of a stage setting made of plaster, on which the pictures are thrown instead of a canvas screen. "The Three Musketeers" will run indefinitely. Difficulty was found in securing proper music to accompany these pictures so the opening was postponed to have it written, or selected. Max Hirshfield conducted the full orchestra, which added life to the production materially.

Audience of Distinguished Government Officials View Remarkable Subject in Washington.

AS the result of the expedition made by Colonel William F. Cody, better known the length and breadth of the continent and abroad as "Buffalo Bill," and other famous warriors, American history will still further be preserved through the medium of the moving pictures. These gentlemen have just returned from an expedition to South Dakota and have brought with them more than 30,000 feet of film, nearly every foot of which contains some breath of excitement and adventure.

To reproduce these scenes of the Indian wars of North America it required the service of some 3,000 men, women and horses; some of the scenes requiring up to 2,000 individuals in their production, and the action extends over more than 2,000 miles of territory. Those interested left Chicago for the Pine Ridge Indian Agency in South Dakota and from September 26, to November 1, last, they were busily engaged in real, hard work.

The story is well told by Colonel Cody, who explained his object in taking these pictures before an audience of which the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, secretary of the interior; other members of President Wilson's cabinet, members of both branches of Congress, and other dignitaries, which gathered at the New Home Club, on Jackson Place, Washington, D. C., Friday evening, Feb. 27, to witness the first exhibition of these most wonderful pictures. "My object and desire," said Buffalo Bill, "has been to preserve history by the aid of the camera with as many of the living participants in the closing Indian wars of North America as could be procured. It is something that has never been done before; that is, to preserve our old wars for future generations by living or moving pictures.

"I first broached the subject to Secretary of War Lindley M. Garrison and Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane, and they approved of taking these remarkable pictures, provided they could be made historically correct, and would tell the story of the old Indian wars and the progress of the Indian up to the present time. Secretary Garrison gave me permission to use the United States troops for this expedition, and Secretary Lane authorized the mobilization of the Indians necessary for the purpose.

"Then I looked around and found as many of the old-time army officers as are now living, who had actually participated in these campaigns and events that occurred twenty-five to forty years ago, and I finally succeeded in getting them to agree to appear in reproducing these battles with the aid of the modern camera, true to life and history. My efforts were rewarded in securing such men as: Generals Nelson A. Miles, Jesse M. Lee, Frank D. Baldwin, Marion P. Maus, and Charles King, and Colonel H. G. Sickles, now of the 12th United States Cavalry. These men, of course, were then younger, and with less rank than they have at the present time.

"We then proceeded to the Pine Ridge and 'fought' the Indians at the Battle of Warbonnet Creek. We have reproduced the campaign of 1890 and 1891, known as the Ghost Dance or Messiah Craze War, which included the capture of Chief Big Foot and his followers, December 28th; the Battle of Wounded Knee, December 29th, under the command of General James William Forsyth, with the 7th Cavalry, and the Battle of the Mission, December 30, 1890, where General Guy V. Henry went to the relief of the 7th Cavalry; the Battle of Summit Springs, fought on June 11, 1869, on the eastern borders of Colorado, under command of General Eugene A. Carr, and the battle known as Warbonnet Creek, fought on July 17, 1876, under command of General Wesley Merritt, at which time General Charles King was adjutant of the 5th United States Cavalry."

Since the taking of these pictures some of the participants have died and others, perhaps more especially the Indians, are too old to again go through the stirring times of the old days.

Of the Indians, "Short Bull," still a moving spirit in a more moderate religious sense among his people, led in person hundreds of warriors, many veterans of the warpath of the powerful Red Cloud, Ogallalla and Spotted Tail Brule, Sioux, through the familiar scenes. The greatest difficulty encountered in getting these men together was to convince them that the purpose of this mobilization was merely to reproduce the wars and not to annihilate them, for when they saw the Hotchkiss guns, the rifles, revolvers and cases of ammunition, there was a feeling of unrest, as though the time had come when they were to be gathered in by the Great Spirit through the agency of the white men. When this feeling was finally dispelled one of the Indians, who felt disgruntled because he was not allowed to enact the part of a chief, tried to prevent a continuance of the work by causing the withdrawal of the Indians.

Other difficulties which presented themselves was the coming of a blizzard following a "take" in the Bad Lands and a portion of the return trip was made through the snow, giving however, an excellent opportunity to the cameramen to depict the hardships experienced by the troops in the old days, for they were successful in getting a picture of the troops on the march through the snow.

In assigning places to the participants in these pictures, no particular parts were given out to other than the leading characters—all were told to simply reenact the parts taken by them at the original battles. Thus another difficulty presented itself for the Indians refused to remain "dead" after being "killed" unless they were absolutely without ammunition and then they would roll over that they might get a better view of the antics of their brothers. Thus, often comedy is injected into an otherwise very serious affair. No five-cent novel of our boyhood days is nearly as exciting as are these pictures; the war dances of the Indians in the native costumes, the encircling of the camps of the settlers, the killing of settlers and Indians and the burning of camps and tepees, horse rustling, scalping, real battles between redskins and troops, wonderful rescues, and other hair-raising thrillers are all to be found in the reels. The effect of the pictures on an audience was evidenced by the alternate handclapping, cheers and hisses which greeted individual action when viewed by the aforementioned gentlemen, who make laws and do other things in the interest of the country, and their families.

Following the "action," one is carried into more peaceful scenes where Indian boys and girls in the uniforms of the schools which they attend are seen saluting the American flag, Indian-farmers bringing in the results of a season's work, the schools, agencies, and other modern buildings, and we may also see the last word in civilization, a seven-passenger touring car.

The picture was produced by the Essanay Company under the direction of Vernon M. Day and Theodore Wharton.

Jack Hopkins

JACK HOPKINS is an artist of rare ability. His theatrical career began in college days where he acquired the unique sobriquet of "The Man of Many Faces." His brother, "Ben Walker" Hopkins, then stage manager of the Broadwells Opera House, Saginaw, Michigan, was the instrumentality through which his real theatrical career began.

Jack Hopkins.

Mr. Hopkins was first cast under Johnny Ray's direction as "Jim," the dumb messenger boy, in "The Village Blacksmith." Next "Reuben," in "Joshua Whitcomb."

After fourteen months as leading man of this stock company, Mr. Hopkins harkened to the call of the movies. A. D. Hotaling, comedy director of Lubinville was the one through whom the call came. While at Lubin's, Mr. Hopkins proved himself "The Man of Many Faces," being featured in everything from a negro to King Lear.

Mr. Hopkins' pet project is the playwright game. During one of his "peddling expeditions," in New York, he had the good fortune to meet James Montgomery Flagg. Mr. Flagg, always on the lookout for classic types, managed to secure some of Mr. Hopkins' time to pose for the hero in his serial sketches "The Adventures of Kitty Cobb," contracted for by the New York World. Mr. Hopkins is to be featured in the forthcoming moving picture series of short stories which derive their name from this serial story.

The Screen Children's Gallery

By W. Stephen Bush

Master Robert J. Connelly.

THE interview with Master Robert J. Connelly, aged four, was robbed of all privacy through the enthusiastic interest displayed in the proceedings by the staff and the bystanders in the offices of the Vitagraph publicity department. At an early stage of the affair it was deemed wise to suspend the ordinary formalities attendant upon an interview, and to conduct negotiations through the helpful medium of the mother, who urged the young man "to tell the nice gentleman all about himself." Master Robert was far from being impressed, and only when it was further explained to him that the "nice gentleman" would put his picture in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD was there anything like a cheerful response, and even then he caught his clue rather from his mother's manner than from any inward conviction, that the proceedings would result in any tangible benefit to him.

Master Robert J. Connelly.

Master Robert, when queried as to his preferences, made the most remarkable statement, that he liked "sick parts." This no doubt was due to the fact that he had just been in a picture where the action required him to walk on a crutch.

Robert is a clever, manly little chap, earnest in his manner and possessed of that frankness which is the chief charm of extreme youth. He has tremendous respect for his director, and, upon demand, will shed real tears. His mother has perfect control over his emotions, and when the action in the film require him to cry he asks his mother "to get him started." The mother then pictures a woeful vision of domestic tragedy, and instantly the lachrymal flow is in motion. Bedewed on the right cheek and the left with bona fide tears, Robert "enters." The camera does the rest. Asked for a few biographical data, the mother was about to impart the desired information when Master Robert very ingenuously interrupted her and related how, upon a recent occasion, his mother and his aunt had enjoyed an ice cream debauch in which he had not participated. Oh, the wrongs of our childhood, our horrible infantile wrongs. Robert assured the interviewer that he received his "enghelope" promptly on the Saturday of every week.

Robert has appeared to great advantage in "Bunny's Mistake," "Carpenter," "Street Singers," "Goodness Gracious," etc. He has developed wonderfully in the last year, and in a number of coming Vitagraph releases he will be seen to the great delight of audiences all over the world. Two of these releases in the near future will be "The Crutch" and "The Portrait." I heard it rumored that he will soon be featured in a series of special pictures.

The Young Actor at His Work.

Helen E. Connelly.

Miss Helen E. Connelly, aged six, and sister of Robert, is a most bewitching little lady with soft brown eyes and an air of artistic languor, which, I fear, is not her normal attitude, but one especially assumed for the benefit of the interviewer. I thought so at least until, in reply to my question concerning her preferences, the young lady declared that she liked "dying parts" better than any other. She liked people to be sorry for her she said and she just knew that she had everybody's sympathy in a "dying part." A glimpse of the eternal feminine. Miss Helen was quite willing to give an exhibition of her "dying powers" on the spot, but was gently restrained by her mother. Next to "dying parts," the young lady likes "rich parts" best.

Helen E. Connelly.

I learned, nevertheless, that Miss Connelly started her career as miniature motion picture artiste with the Pathé Company at the tender age of three. Her directors found her intelligent and pliable, and she quickly rose in favor. She played "quite a part" in the "Girl in the Film," which is accounted one of her decided successes. She is versatile and can jump from one part to another without any apparent effort. She is, in the truest artistic sense of the word, as impressionable as wax. Other plays in which Miss Helen has acted with success were "The Feudist" and "The Ancient Order of Good Fellows." The Vitagraph Company always has splendid opportunities for gifted children, and I hear that little Helen is scheduled for much interesting work in the near future.

It Has Been Said That All Women Are Actresses.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

AT the meeting of the Executive Board of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association in this city last week it was reported that only fifty per cent. of the 1,700 exhibitors in the State of New York are paying dues to the organization. As a result of this report an organizer was appointed to travel through the state and endeavor to secure the enrollment of every exhibitor now outside the fold.

The report is not a surprising one. Since the business was first started the disposition of more than half the exhibitors has been to get all they can with the least possible outlay of effort and money, and let their fellow exhibitors do the fighting for rights and protection. The movement of the association to "round up" the delinquent exhibitors is a good one and should be encouraged by every exhibitor in the state, but no matter how energetic and effective the undertaking may be carried on it will not get all the exhibitors into the ranks.

There is no other field that embraces more men of crude business ability and careless, reckless methods than that of the motion picture exhibitors. The reason for this is that it is such a peculiar field that men of absolutely no business training, in fact without even a normal amount of intelligence, have been able to embark in it if they had a few hundred dollars with which to pave the way. They know nothing about standards, or the elevation of them. Everything tending in that direction looks to them like graft, or some blackmailing scheme. Once they get hold of a picture house they have but one aim—get all the nickels and dimes they can at the lowest possible cost. Tell these people that the object of the association is to secure ordinances and laws for their protection and to outline plans for the advancement of their business and they look at you blankly. To most of them there is but one effective appeal. They laugh when told there is danger of some law being enacted or enforced to put them out of business, because of the supreme confidence they have in an acquaintance with some one of the law makers. But tell them that if they do not enroll and keep their dues paid up a bomb be placed under their theaters and their business seriously interfered with and they will flock like frightened geese for protection. This is not stated as a hint to the organizer for the exhibitors as to his procedure, but to show as pointedly as possible the calibre of some people who still exist in the motion picture business and unfortunately have the right of claim to being exhibitors.

There is another class which helps swell the number of non-organization men. They are of the speculative variety. They wait for a chance to buy cheap from someone who has been unfortunate, or for some other reason cannot make his place pay. They are primarily responsible for keeping undesirable people in the exhibiting field and one of the chief aims of the Exhibitors' Association should be to try and devise some means whereby the operations of these speculators may be squelched, or curtailed to some extent. They will take hold of any old place and by elevating the service increase the box office receipts sufficiently to tempt some "boob" who is anxious to become a theater owner. Then they unload. Many of them do not take the time or trouble to legitimately better the health of the box office, but daringly pad the daily reports, or pack the house with co-conspirators at opportune times, and the number of times they get away with it is surprising. There is not the least doubt that this leprous part of the business could be wiped out by application of the laws relating to conspiracy to defraud, but up to date none of the victims have taken the step. Most of them have said they will do the best they can with the bad bargains, as they have lost too much and cannot afford to spend money in law suits. If they were members of the Exhibitors' Association and the association had itself equipped to co-operate in such cases the results might be different and the panhandlers driven out of the field, leaving it to the people who are in it for a legitimate purpose.

The temptation to indulge in such operations for the purpose of turning over money quick at a good profit has become so great that many men and women well known in the business are taking a hand in it. Only a few days ago the writer asked an exhibitor how he was getting along at a place he recently opened. The reply was: "Oh, fairly well. To be honest about the matter, business is not good. We are making a living out of it; but the receipts are growing. We'll have it so in a little while that some 'sucker' will come along and be glad to grab it. Then we'll clean up. That is the only way to make money in the business nowadays." Heaven help the business, and give those in authority the ability to intelligently demonstrate the difference between such operations and the "salting" of mines for prospective purchasers.

These are the opportune days—the days of John Doe proceedings—to instill into some of the victims enough courage to enable them to come forward and have such transactions scrutinized. The lepers not only rob the unwary, but harass legitimate exhibitors who are unfortunately located in or near the field of operations. Their transactions are a theme for serious consideration and should be discussed at the next national convention of the exhibitors.

Another commendable movement by the executive committee of the Exhibitors' Association was a motion endorsing the national censor board as against all state censorships and requesting all manufacturers to send their films to be censored. It is a double header of some weight. The first part of the motion is opportune, as it is contemporaneous with the institution of injunction proceedings by the Mutual Film Corporation to restrain the city of Chicago from censoring films, on the ground that the censorship is unconstitutional. This suit will bring the question squarely to the front and if the injunction is sustained the decision will kill state censorship agitations.

The second part of the motion places on record the desire of the exhibitors to exhibit nothing only that which can stand censorship. While the thought is not detailed by the motion it is clear that the exhibitors have full confidence in the methods of the National Board of Censors; that they are ready at all times to abide by all regulations and restrictions that are not arbitrarily imposed and do not work upon the manufacturers unnecessary loss of time and money when the same result can be obtained under existing conditions. The interest of the exhibitors in the latter phase of the case lies in the fact that they should not be deprived of anything to their benefit by the whims of local authorities.

The latter part of the motion may also be assumed to reflect an intention on the part of the Association Exhibitors to ultimately refrain from using films produced by firms who refuse to submit their subjects for censorship. If this assumption is not correct, then the invitation embodied by the motion will fall upon barren soil. There are lepers in the producing field, as well as among the exhibitors. There are some who dare not, and others who will not, submit to censorship even under the most favorable conditions. The business as a whole suffers from their connection with it and it is in the power of the exhibitors to drive them out. It is a power equal to that of the censor board, if not greater, because it reaches producers who, for obvious reasons, the board cannot get hold of. It is the same power the city of Chicago will have, even if the Mutual injunction suit prevails against it.

One exhibitor, in discussing the matter, said that to turn down a film because it had not been censored would be boycotting the producer, and he did not believe in boycotts. This is not sound reasoning. To accept it would be an endorsement of evasion of the pure food laws. If there is any violation of principle, or compunction of conscience, it can only affect the producer who refuses inspection of his wares. If the city of Chicago is beaten in the Mutual suit it will still have the alternative of turning down the subject because it has not been censored by the National Board. If an exhibitor who has the welfare of the business in view is offered an uncensored film he will be justified in refusing to use it until it receives the stamp of approval.

A $100,000 PICTURE HOUSE AT JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

The Republic Theater Company is a new corporation formed at Jacksonville, Fla., for the purpose of building a $100,000 moving picture and vaudeville theater on the south side of Forsyth Street, between Main and Laura, that city. When the new theater is completed it will be under the management of G. N. Montgomery, one of the Board of Directors of the new company. The structure will be absolutely fireproof and it will be one of the finest in the South. The new house will be located in one of the best centers of Jacksonville, and it is expected to be ready for occupancy about September 1, 1914.

The Picture as a Lecturer.

THE moving picture has become so great an aid to the lecturer that it bids fair upon many occasions to supplant the human agency and perform those functions itself. In Battle Creek, Mich., recently, two large conventions were held, in each of which the pictures almost entirely supplanted the speakers. For the Michigan Retail Monument Dealers, films were shown, depicting the granite and marble industries of Barre, Vt. No speeches could possibly have given so much, or such valuable information, as did the pictures. Consequently, the delegates were rewarded with a greater store of helpful information than the old-fashioned convention could possibly impart. For the Farmers' "Round-up" Convention, films showing model farms in all parts of the country were shown, as also all kinds of modern methods, modern implements and utensils and modern dairying processes were shown which, in the vocabulary of the reporter, "proved a bigger hit than the speeches." It is only natural that the moving picture should be installed as the "permanent lecturer" in the schools of the deaf and dumb. Reports in the daily press from different parts of the country show how the use of the pictures in the instruction of deaf mutes is rapidly increasing; surely, nowhere can the pictures make more rapid educational advances than among this unfortunate class, to whom they must be a great joy.

In Debate: "Are Moving Pictures a Menace or a Help?"

A high school in Pennsylvania has adopted the above subject for their school debate; there can no doubt be much profit in the discussion. Both the positive and negative sides will be helpful; "pros and cons" always bring out the "reals"—even the faults may be exaggerated; they only make the truths more apparent and real. There is only one condition upon which such debates may be rightly conducted, and that is that the debaters must know, from personal contact and experience, what they are talking about. The writer has heard many impromptu debates between men of public standing on the merits or demerits of the pictures; in the majority of instances he has found that the most bitter opponents or critics of the pictures were the most ignorant; conspicuous among these was a teacher who said, "I have never seen a moving picture, and never intend to see one," thus parading his ignorance as an argument. It is not likely that among high school pupils that there will be any but intelligent discussion, and we do not doubt the outcome; indeed, let us hope that this method of talking about the pictures will continue and spread—it will do good to the debaters, to their hearers, and to the pictures.

"Millions for Safety."

"Coal Age," one of the most important industrial papers in the United States, in recording the enormous loss of life and the more enormous numbers of those injured in the hazardous occupations, reports also that never before were such vast amounts of money being spent, especially by the large and wealthy corporations, for safety devices and protective methods as to-day. It is, therefore, most interesting in this connection to note that the moving picture is one of the most opportune and beneficial instruments to aid in this laudable work.

It is now becoming popular to organize "Safety First" exhibitions in the large centers, where films showing views of "preventable accidents" with simple precautions and methods, causing little attentions to otherwise omitted details, which mean much, in that instant of time when to do the right thing means to save a life or lives. To mention one out of many conspicuous instances, the superintendent of the Fort Wayne and Indiana Northern Traction Company gives weekly exhibitions with the object of "educating those concerned" in the best ways to avoid accidents. Besides pictures for employees, the public is invited, including children, for, surely, safety pictures are those to which censorship would be strangely misapplied. To those to whom the usefulness of the moving picture has been a hobby, it now becomes interesting to note, that, in its ascent to more profitable heights, the picture has now become a "life saver."

A helpful set of films has been acquired by The Western Utilities Company on "Preversation," in association with the Bureau of Safety of Chicago.

Social organizations everywhere are combining for the introduction of lectures to the general public and to school children, on the common dangers of everyday life, so that no part of an ordinary day's living shall be without its knowledge of that intuition which comes as a result of training which has not been hard to learn. That the kinematograph should be called upon to take such an important part in safety, efficiency, lifesaving, and all that goes with the value of human existence is a delight to all its admirers.

It may be well to add that not alone in the industrial and everyday commercial aspects of life is the kinematograph becoming so valuable an aid, but also in the enjoyments of life, sports on land or water, are being safely taught, enjoyment without its former attendant dangers is the possible future of the coming generation, who will be loud in their praises of that good fortune which gave them birth in the days of the educational possibilities of kinematography.

THE RAVAGES OF THE SERBS IN ALBANIA.

Before an audience consisting of many of the city's most noted philanthropists and clergymen, seven reels of pictures were shown last Saturday in the Kinemacolor exhibition room, picturing the horrible ravages and cruelties of the Servian soldiery in Albania. The pictures had been taken by the Rev. William Willard Howard, a missionary in the afflicted country. Mr. Howard had made a four hundred mile journey through the devastated regions and had gathered up eloquent and irrefutable evidence of the brutal outrages committed by the Serbs.

Mr. Howard explained the pictures as they were shown on the screen. He said that Servia, without any apparent provocation and just to gratify her religious fanaticism, had gone through Albania with fire and sword and had reduced a part of the country to ashes. Thousands of Albanians had been slain by the ruthless soldiers, who spared neither sex nor age and who were habitually guilty of the most revolting treachery and cruelty. Mr. Howard showed the misery of the poor people driven from house and home utterly without means of subsistence and in grave danger of starvation. He said that unless relief came quickly hundreds if not thousands of the wretched refugees would, in all probability, perish of starvation or exposure.

The invitations to attend the showing of these remarkable films had been sent out by Oscar S. Straus, who acted on behalf of the American Constantinople Relief Committee, which has its offices in the Bible House in this city. Mr. Howard hopes to be able to return to Albania with enough funds to save at least a portion of the refugees who are tramping the country or cooped up in the crowded quarters of Scutari.

CHANGE OF TITLE FOR KLEINE'S "NAPOLEON."

Through error George Kleine's new eight part subject "For Napoleon and France" was announced in the trade press as simply "Napoleon." The Kleine offices wish to advise that the correct title is "For Napoleon and France," and the subject will be ready for exhibition under that title during March.

TO PUT MORE TEETH IN THE SHERMAN LAW.

The sub-committee of the judiciary committees of Congress, to which have been referred four of the five proposed amendments to the Sherman law, held a hearing recently at which various representatives of alleged monopolized industries were heard. A New York attorney, Mr. G. Rogers, appeared before the committee and made a plea for more drastic legislation to prevent monopolistic practice in the motion picture business.

PARIS LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to The World.)

HENNION, the Prefect of Police, has organized a complete course of moving pictures for the education of members of the Paris police force. Commencing this month, regular cinematograph educational classes will be given at the police headquarters. The elaborate series of moving pictures, which have been specially prepared under the supervision of the prefect, will show youthful police officers how to deal with lawbreakers, regulate traffic, assist the young and infirm, and a hundred and one other essential parts of a policeman's duty. Views of the principal sights of Paris and the way in which the men are rewarded for bravery and good work are also included in this unique collection of films. In an official communiqué, Hennion describes his films as a "History of Crime," and says that he believes that in a few months his men will be able to gain knowledge which would take several years to pick up while on duty in the streets. The prefect will, from time to time, attend in person at the classes.

The "four to seven" Kinemacolor conference at the Edouard VII Theater are proving very popular, and the management is showing no little enterprise in engaging a host of talented speakers to lecture in conjunction with the natural color pictures.

The Magic Cinema Palace, located at Magic City, has secured the district rights for Gaumont first-run programs.

F. G. Goldsoll's Napoleon feature film, "The Hundred Days," after having been shown at the Gaumont Palace Hippodrome with much success, is now the star item at the Passy Cinema Theater.

Two huge picture theaters are now being constructed on the main boulevards. The respective proprietors are the Tivoli Company and Messrs Delac, who run the Film d' Art Company. The Cinema des Nouveautes is located on the site of the old theater of the same name within a few seconds' walk of the Pathé Palace, while the other edifice will stand a couple of hundred yards further down the boulevard des Italiens. The Cinema des Nouveautes is being equipped by the well-known firm of Etablissements Jacopozzi, and will have a seating capacity of fifteen hundred.

When these two places are running, it will be interesting to see their respective programs. It is problematical whether the Electric Palace, Gab Ka and Pathé Palace, which are all on the same boulevard, will be able to compete with the new departures.

Edison's laughable film, "Why Girls Go Wrong," has made a big hit here.

I have it on good authority that the Paris branch of the Universal Company is doing excellent business, and that the firm's policy of selling films on the open market has met with success.

The lion tamer, George Marck, is presenting a remarkable act at the Moulin Rouge Music Hall. The production is a combination of moving pictures and stage spectacle. This is the story told by the moving pictures. A hunter rescues a little girl from the clutches of a beggar and takes her off on a lion-hunting expedition. In Africa, by means of traps, the hunter catches some fine lions alive and sends them back as trophies to his sweetheart. She has a den constructed in her garden. When the screen rises the hunter is shown, as he was a second before in the pictures, standing outside the woman's mansion. To the right are seen the lions. While a dinner party is in progress the beggar manages to release the lions, and the animals roam about the garden. Then follows an exciting fight between the hero and the lions. Marck falls to the ground, and the climax is reached when little Yvonne Marck climbs out of the window, and, armed with a revolver, comes to the rescue of her foster parent, who, recovering, drives the lions back to their den. The stage setting is very effective, and the sketch is the most applauded item in the Moulin Rouge revue. Messrs. Eclair were responsible for the cinematograph portion of the act, which is splendidly done. Nothing like this has ever been seen here before, and indeed I believe this is the first time living lions and cinematograph pictures have been presented in one act.

Fouquet has resigned his position of editor of a cinematograph paper to take up a post with the Eclipse Company.

Jacques Haik, who made himself popular while with the Paris branch of the M. P. Sales Company, has started on his own account. He has been fortunate enough to obtain the French concessions for Kay-Bee, Broncho, Keystone, Majestic and Reliance films, all of which are handled in England by the Western Import Company which has granted the French agency.

Max Maurey, director of the world-famous Grand Guignol Theater, intends to produce picture plays, and has registered the title, "Grand Guignol."

Charles Urban, giving his address as 8 Rue Edouard VII, Paris, has registered the word "Simplex" and Charles Delac, of 5 Boulevard Montmartre that of "Minerva."

Selig's Tom Mix series is very popular here and Charles Helfer is smiling, while E. H. Montague is despatching big bales of reels from London.

The Exclusive Agency are handling a sensational feature entitled, "How We Are Robbed, How We Are Killed." It is a moving picture version of a book written by a detective, Eugene Villiod, who advertises his profession on a large scale. Sixty thousand copies of the printed work were sold.

The Film d' Art announces the forthcoming release of "Le Roman d'un Spahi," by Pierre Loti.

On February 27th, a comedy featuring the low comedienne, Jeanne Bloch, was released by the Agence Moderne, acting for the producers, "Le Film Parisien."

Owing to a dispute, a party of exhibitors have started a renting business on coöperative lines. The renting firms holding sole agencies for films refuse to supply these to members of the Coöperative, which is hard-pressed for good programs.

Monat, who trades under the name of Monatfilm, has secured from the B. & C. Co., of London, the world's rights, England and her colonies and Italy, excepted, F. Burlingham's remarkable film, "Down the Crater of Vesuvius."

In spite of French antipathy—which, by the way, is non-existent in trade circles—the Imperator Company, of Berlin, is offering the rights of Doctor Paul Meissner's cinetragedy in five acts, "The Man Without Arms."

I just learn that Horace D. Sedger, who is associated with Edward Laurillard in the management of Electric Palaces (London) has joined the board of the Societé des Films Menchen. This will assure for Joseph Menchen a good showing for all his productions in London. Menchen's novelty film, made by Michel Carré, entitled "Tangomania," has created a big sensation.

A. H. Kaffenburgh, the American proprietor of the American Theater here, was the recipient of an astonishing letter the other day. The writer was a regular patron of the hall and he said that if Mr. Kaffenburgh continued to exhibit German productions he and his friends would cease to pay their twice-weekly visits. Public feeling here has done much to stop the sales of films from Germany, and it is practically impossible to disguise a Teutonic photoplay.

The first production of the Filma Company was secured as an exclusive at the Colisee Cinema in the Champs Elysees. The play was a detective drama, entitled, "La Trace." Plaisetty, president of the Filma Company, announces other sensations in the near future, and says he has secured the service of a new photoplay actress.

Henny Porten is featured at the Electric Palace. Names are at last beginning to count in photoplay bills here.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

ARE we to have a "boom" in natural color moving pictures? The question suggests itself from the fact that since December over a round dozen different processes for producing self-colored films have been deposited at the Patent Office for registration. Two-thirds of these appear, from the specifications obtainable, to be but variations of the principle of taking a negative in the ordinary course through three filters of different colors and exhibiting them in a manner similar to the present successful process known as "Kinemacolor." One of these which appears to embody outstanding features is the discovery of Mr. Colin Bennett, a well known authority upon moving picture technicalities in this country and the writer is not the only one anticipating far-reaching improvements when the system comes into the market. Another invention relating to the production of stereoscopic moving pictures in colors is by Lord Tiverton and Mr. E. A. Merckel. An alternating series of negatives is taken, each series forming a complete three color record, and the whole projected through color screens in stereoscopic relation. Mr. J. E. Thornton, of Rochester, N. Y., has applied for a patent for color pictures upon the superimposition principle, while another peculiar procedure specifies the taking of color films by a two-color process and exhibiting the results simultaneously through two projectors. A feature claimed for the latter process is that the absorption of light experienced when a single projector is used is compensated by the use of two machines.

Nevada, the new brand of western pictures is being released in Great Britain from the London office of the Cosmopolitan Film Co. "The Bugle Call," the first of the series, is dated for liberation on March 9th.

H. A. Spoor, the London manager of the Essanay Co., is by common consent one of the most enterprising American agents in the metropolis. Hitherto it has been the custom to show a continuous program of new releases to the trade at the Essanay private theater from Monday to Thursday. Another commodious theater has now been acquired and fitted with two projectors and will be used for the screening of any particular film it may be desired to show at a moment's notice.

"The Life of Shakespeare," the next feature of the British & Colonial Co. is, I am informed, rapidly nearing completion. During the past three months all the scenes have been photographed, mostly in the immediate vicinity of Stratford on Avon, and the advance copies will probably reach America in the course of the next few weeks.

BRITISH ARMY FILMS.

As an evidence of the constant expansion of the usefulness of motion pictures, the British newspapers report the filming of the British Army by permission of the British Army Council. An English firm, Messrs. Keith, Prowse and Company, have done the filming. The pictures had their first public exhibition in London, where they drew vast crowds. The American rights for this picture are now offered for sale as appears in the advertising columns.

UNIVERSAL COMPANY TO HAWAII.

On or about March 1st, Henry McRae, director of 101 Bison dramas at the Universal Pacific Coast studios, and his entire company, will sail from San Francisco for the Hawaiian Islands for the purpose of taking a dozen or more motion pictures characteristic of Hawaiian history, customs, traditions and institutions.

Among the actors who will accompany Mr. McRae are: William Clifford, Sherman Bainbridge, Valentine Paul, Marie Walcamp and Lula Warrenton. Miss Ruth Ann Baldwin will accompany the party in the capacity of scenario writer.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

To Bill

LATELY we have been thinking of writing to Bill and telling him to spruce up a bit, and this intention has been strengthened by recent letters that others have written us, so this is what Bill got:

Dear Bill,—

Either you have the writer's cramp or you are shy of two-cent stamps, for you never even acknowledged the postcard I sent you, but be that as it may, I have a weight on our metaphorical chest and I'm going to spill it on your metaphorical shoulders and let you lug it around for a time. And the sum and substance of the whole thing, Bill, is doll up. I don't mean invest in red neckties and the other habiliments of joy that pass current in your native town if not in New York. Your wife can look after that end, but you spend some money on your house. There was a time in the memory of man when any old shop with any old screen would pull in the nickels like the kids going in to swim the first warm day of spring, but the time is wenting, William, and if you do not want to went along with the times, get busy with the pretty-pretty stuff and lug some of it into your house. Now that doesn't mean doing something. It means doing everything, and doing everything doesn't mean spending money like a drunken sailor, but making the money you do spend count.

Some exhibitors buy one of those electrical fountains to put in the lobby, or a couple of those pots with electrical flowers and think the whole place is dressed up like a plush horse. But friend patron gets past the electrical display and forgets all about that as he sits facing the screen. It made an impression on him as he entered, but the impression didn't last. All the display is at his back after he once gets through the door. He takes perhaps two minutes getting into his seat and he spends an hour or so looking at the screen. Give him something at that end of the house and you hit him at least thirty times as hard.

With Frills.

You have seen how it has been done—and you've seen how it should not be done. Now get hep to the fact that there is coming a change in fashions. A house out of fashion is seven times more miserable than a woman in last year's bonnet and a dress made over last year from the year before. She may have her health, but she isn't happy and she shows it. Even her smile hurts you. It's the same with a house. You look to see more than you used to and the fad for dressing the stage is presently going to sweep the country. The Vitagraph Theater in New York is not setting the fashion, but following it, but it's a shining mark and more will take the hint from the Vitagraph Theater than from Rothapfel, who started it all.

That Vitagraph special set cost a lot of money; more money than a small house can afford, but good taste and quick wits can replace the actual outlay of the hard coin, and if you cannot get a special setting painted, you can put the frills on the stage—only don't get too frilly. Dress your stage; don't overdress it or underdress it. Don't put on a gilt chair and a table and think the stage is set. Don't set the stage at all, for that matter, set your screen. Don't put anything on that will detract from the picture when it is running, but dress the frame to soften the harshness of the stage and help along the illusion.

Don't bank in with a lot of cloth flowers and pea lights. That is good for the lobby—if you dust the flowers daily—but for the stage you want nothing so pronounced, you need something soft, vague, indefinite; something the eye sees, but seeing, does not see. For that reason you cannot play up light tones and yet you want nothing somber, nothing that suggests that you hired an undertaker instead of a decorator. You need something that looks well when the lights are full on and that is pleasing when the picture runs.

This sounds like a pretty large order, but it need not be. Get a small stage, the sort the kiddies play with. Experiment with that and you can do it inexpensively and make lots of experiments. You'll hit on something good after a while. Then you can build the big stage. If you cut the opening to fit your own proscenium measurements, you'll have your design to scale, which will help a lot.

The Reason Why.

And the reason why is very simple. The new stuff, the big reel stuff, is bringing to the houses better people; people who were coaxed by "Quo Vadis?" and that sort of stuff and who turn to the regular picture theaters once they have found that the pictures are something bigger and better than they thought they were.

These are persons of good taste and refinement, who demand not only good pictures and good projection, but who want pleasant surroundings, something that approximates the comfort of their own homes. These want what they want, and if they cannot have it they will not stay long as a permanent patronage. They are willing to pay for what they want, and they would rather pay a quarter than a dime and will be willing to kiss a half dollar good-bye for stuff that is worth the half—and they do not demand too much for their money, either. You can keep on kicking along as a ten-cent house with a ten-cent crowd and a ten-cent show if you want to, but I know blamed well you won't want to, so I am wising you up ferninst the time when you'll either have to be there all set and ready to start or be scratched from the race.

Pull in with the real people, be the first in your town to follow the lead, and the fellow down the street will make some money on your turnaway, but not as much as you'll be making. There will always be five-and ten-cent houses, but if you'll back up the vacuum cleaner with some tasteful house decoration and a well set stage, you'll have to use two banks to keep your money in.

And make a side note that this sort of an audience will want the pictures played. They won't like it if Prof. Gustenberg and his orchestra of soloists pound out Tannhauser all through a farce, and wind up with the big noise just as a new picture is starting, and they are trying to get into the atmosphere of a drama. They don't want to hear music, because they do not belong to the class of people who will follow a minstrel band seven blocks. They appreciate the musical accompaniment to a picture, but they don't like noise.

Now see what you can do and let me know what you have done and next time you come to town we'll split fifty-fifty on some Clover Clubs—yes?

Six for a Quarter.

Wirt S. McLaren, of the Princess Theater, Chelsea, Mich., sends a ticket with this explanation:

> Enclose find three hand-bills or dodgers, which we would like to have you pass an opinion on. We are ofttimes unable to get regular heralds on many of our pictures, so have to have the local printer try "his best."
> We also enclose a "Ticket" to our theater for Anniversary Week, February 2 to 7. We ordinarily run a straight 10 cent house, three reels, but felt that we could get a lot of those who come only "once-in-a-while" to become steady patrons, by giving them a solid week of shows at less than half price. We feel that from our heavy advance sale that our plan promises to be a success. People who never have gone to our house are asking for the tickets. The idea in making the tickets "Not Transferable" is to get the holder to come the whole week, and we are convinced that by that time he will have "become converted." What do you think of the stunt?

The ticket is a strip of cardboard with the program for the week divided by perforating rule, each section of the program being good for that night only, the entire ticket being purchased at once for a quarter. The average man or woman is apt to figure that if but three coupons are used they are five cents in, and having the ticket for the week will use all of the coupons. Three reels are run each evening.

The plan is good for use once. It brings strangers into the house, though not many perhaps, the latter depending upon the temper of the town. It is, however, a good idea for the regular patron, and serves to mark the anniversary. It would have been better had the proposition been stated with greater definiteness on the stub of the ticket. Nothing has been done to give it the appearance of a "regular" ticket. The mental suggestion of much for little is absent because the ticket itself is so unimpressive. It looks more like an advertisement than an admission slip, indeed, the same type was used for a dodger with no other change than reversing the section to have Monday at the top of the dodger instead of at the bottom of the ticket as being the first to be removed.

Dodgers.

Two of the three dodgers sent follow the same lines, the title of the film in large black letters and some connecting reading matter. Part of the bill for "The Last Days of Pompeii" reading:

> THE
> Princess Theater offers its patrons the greatest feature attraction before the public. It's their first and > LAST > chance to see this most wonderful picture. Owing to the great popularity, to-day, Wednesday, Jan. 29, promises to be the day of > DAYS
> In the history of the Princess, etc.

This would do well enough for once, but there is no punch, no argument to the material. Evidently Mr. McLaren wrote it in a hurry, but it would have been better to have taken a little more time in which to have written something that would be more than the mere announcement. It tells that the picture cost $100,000 to produce, but there is no hint of the various talking points that would make a person want to see it. If he wants to see "The Last Days of Pompeii," this is intimation that the picture is in town, but there is no coaxing argument.

The cut shows the front dressed for "Beauty and the Beast." The Santa Claus person and the greens suggest that it must have been given around Christmas and that the whiskered figure is not the Beast of the film. An animal mask could have been rented and the Beast would have attracted more attention to the film than the conventional Santa Claus, perhaps bringing in enough more business to pay for the rental of the mask and express charges to and from the city. Many houses are turning strongly to the live advertisement and where it is desired to attract the transient patronage it seems to pay well to hire a man and a costume. The good feature of the cut is that they use much paper without seeming to overcrowd the lobby. This is done by setting some of the paper back against the wall instead of permitting it to dangle from the front just high enough to hit the hats of the patrons as they enter.

What Means M. M. B. A. A. T. S. G.

That is what Philip Reich, of the Auditorium, Meyersdale, Pa., is asking his patrons. As he uses the Mutual program we can guess that the first two letters stand for Mutual Movies. Mr. Reich uses a card program printed on both sides. It carries rather too much type to interest the reader who is not a confirmed fan, but the use of uniform type for the different features and descriptions helps to keep the card from looking too jumbled. Six reels on Saturday for five cents is too much film. It should not be necessary to offer a double show on what generally is the best day of the week. If he can get the crowd with three reels other days, he should be able to do it on Saturday. The readers for the various titles are well done, apparently being specially written. The feature is pulled up to advantage without too much being said, two to four lines being given each subject, which should be plenty where the matter is interestingly put.

Melies Matter.

In keeping with the rest of the Melies awakening, they are circularizing the managers with offers of lobby displays and photographs. If you did not get their letter, write them anyway.

Local Stuff.

The Gotham Film ompany is making a specialty of reels of home scenes for local exhibitors. Newell's Theater, White Plains, N. Y., was one of the early patrons and the local reel excited far greater interest than any multiple reel feature could have been. This has been the case ever since the early days of the fifty foot subjects when local pictures excited far greater interest than the most vivid pictures of European scenery. It gave the Biograph the inside track over the Lumiere machine in the Keith theaters because people preferred to see the pictures of the town to the best that Europe had to offer.

Still Running.

Quite a long time ago we spoke of the Palace Daily News, a one-page publication of the Milledgeville, Ga., Palace. In renewing his subscription (and he says this paper is as necessary to him as the films), Edmund Reid sends volume three, number one hundred and nine. It evidently runs two volumes to the year. It does not run quite as much local news as it did on account of a greater proportion of advertising. It seems to be the local news medium. It is run off on colored news stock, printed on one side only, the sheet being 10 by 15 inches, printed the wide way. It is elementary as compared to some of the pretentious sheets, but it has stuck through nearly eighteen months and seems to be making money and doing the work it is asked to do. You can't ask more.

Breezy.

The Weekly Bulletin is a breezy youngster in the interest of the Atlas Theater, Milwaukee. If it can hold to the gait it has started on it is going to be widely read. There is a snap and go to it that will cause it to be read with a smile and the advertising items will be read along with the rest that nothing may be missed. H. E. Hood seems to be cut out to be an editor, though he admits that this is his first editorial job and that he had to create it for himself. It's the sort of a weekly program that will give a return to outside advertisers if he goes after them, for the sheet will be looked for each week. He offers to run a kicker's column if anyone will kick and a question box if he can get questions. We particularly like the tone of this paragraph, which perhaps will come in useful to others:

> We received an anonymous letter the other day. It was a criticism on our theater. However just it might have been, we had no chance for rebuttal or explanation. Had that person come to us in person we would have been pleased to talk over matters with him and undoubtedly have been able to have satisfied him and not have left the matter up in the air as it is at present.

The anonymous letter writer is one of the meanest imitations of a human being; a man who has not the nerve to back up his charges, but there is no use getting wrought up over it. A dignified retort of this sort is much better and if there is any decency in the writer's hide this will bring it out more quickly than a "get back."

The second issue keeps up to the first, but it is the fifty-second that counts. We hope that Mr. Hood beats the fifty-two many times over.

Solomon's Ghost Club.

Julian M. Solomon, of the Susquehanna Theater, Philadelphia, explains his Ghost Club idea. This was used to advertise the film of the same name, but the title of the film was not used in the advance work. The work is done with small cards reading "Join the Ghost Club," which are distributed about two weeks before the film is shown. A few days later this is followed up with the statement, "This is to certify that the holder may become a member of the Ghost Club. Ask the Cashier." Then comes "The Ghost Club meets officially at the Lafayette Theater, on January 28th." The day the reels are run the sign in front of the theater reads, "The Ghost Club meets here to-day, initiation ten cents," or whatever the admission may be. The cards are 1¼ by 4¾, the type being set across the narrow measurement, mostly a word to a line and topped by one of the odd ornament cuts from the American type foundries. It makes an odd looking advertisement in keeping with the title and the idea has been used in many of the Philadelphia theaters with advantage. The use of the extremely narrow slip will commend itself for the advertisement of other films, since any unusual cutting attracts attention.

We like one line in Mr. Solomon's advertising that runs: "A smile with every ticket."

Figuring Costs.

A new manager wants to know if we think that with a house seating 400 persons, he is jusified in retaining the orchestra that the former manager had. It costs him $52 a week and he thinks he could save $40 by putting in a $12-a-week pianist.

He might cut the expense down by forty dollars, but whether he would save the money is another question. Here is the way to look at it:

To talk in round numbers we will suppose that he takes in $100 a day. His orchestra costs him $8 a day. A pianist alone would cost but two dollars a day; a saving of $6 a day. The patrons are used to an orchestra. The question is simply this:

Will the patronage remain $100 a day or will the absence of an orchestra keep away a sufficient number of persons to drop the daily receipts below $94? If the patronage falls off more than the $6 represented by the apparent saving, it is not a saving, but a direct loss.

Look at your advertising the same way. You hesitate to spend $5 on some special work, figuring that it will add that much to the expense. That is not the right way to look at it. Figure out if that advertising will bring you in an additional $5 or more on the day. If it will, that $5 does not represent an added expense. It is an investment on which you realize all but the $5 and, even at that, most advertising has an effect that lasts beyond the actual day the advertising is supposed to be effective. If you cannot figure on the results, why not gamble the five and find out?

Too many managers seem to figure only the expense without looking to the returns as well, but the clever exhibitor knows that there are two sides to the question and looks at both. It is in these little points that so many fail.

Still They Come.

The Third Street Theater, Easton Pa., is another house to come into line with a weekly program and this is its salutation:

> ANNOUNCEMENT
> The steady increasing popularity of moving pictures and the remarkable interest in special features, has led us to believe our patrons will enjoy something in the form of a program. We shall therefore issue this leaflet every Saturday. It will contain our announcements for a week in advance, comments on the films and notes of the players, which may be of interest to the public.
> Third Street Theater Co.

We like the looks of the youngster for the most part. It is clean looking, because the job type is held down in the advertising. We do not mean that no display type is used, but that it is of a size in keeping with the size of the column used and this in turn with the size of the page. This is a point wherein many programs fail.

The make-up is well planned. The house program goes down the center of the three-column page, each page carrying a cross page advertisement across one third of the page at the top. Not all of the program columns are filled in with type, possibly because the miscellaneous matter was all used up. The sixth and seventh pages are solid reading matter, mostly manufacturers' announcements, but with some good general matter as well, using one and two bank heads. Bullfinch border is used instead of cut off rules. It seems to be the product of a regular printer plus a man who has the editorial faculty. They come out flat-footed against the sex films and in general show the right spirit. We think it would be well to box in the program with heavy rule or even the bullfinch border. The general effect is better than usual and we hope that the Third Street will send samples to those who ask for help through this department. It is a good model, once the white spaces are filled in. This looks unfinished.

Help Wanted.

L. Garman, 102 West Woodland Avenue, Arlington, Md., is going to open a new house shortly and will appreciate announcements from brother managers.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Dinner.

OWING to the fact that the Inquest and I Am clubs have practically replaced the former photoplay dinners, there has been none announced for this year, but the two clubs will join as hosts in a dinner to be given at Keen's Chop House, West 36th Street, on Saturday evening, March 21st, when any person interested in photoplay and his wife or best girl will be made welcome with no further formality than expressing the desire to be present and sending two dollars for each cover. Reservation must be made in advance, that the committee may know how to provide for the guests. Remittance may be sent to this writer at Box 70, Madison Square Station.

The Inquest Club.

Although the last meeting of the Inquest Club was held on Washington's Birthday, there was nearly a full attendance of the membership and an interesting meeting. Monte Katterjohn, of the Universal, was a witness, but Pop Hoadley went down the street to get some supper. The latter end of it must have been his breakfast. E. M. Wickes rose to a point of personal order anent the last report and stated that the lady stuck "pins" in him, not "pints," as the otherwise and sometimes intelligence compositor had it.

Of the show seen at the Savoy an Edison showed how little plot was needed to make a good comedy, the incidents more than masking the lack of involved plot, but it was pointed out that the incidents all had an actual bearing on the plot and were essential to it. It was also remarked that Edison can get over many nice pieces of business that the average comedy director will slight, the reel showing many little things that might not have been funny in other hands, but which gained laughs.

A Kalem, "The Shadow," was somewhat unusual in that not a single member of the cast held interest at the end of the picture. All of them managed to get "in bad" with the audience at some point in the double reel.

A Vitagraph was chiefly interesting as an example of bridging the excision of scenes by means of leaders to get within the required footage.

Most of the members present announced their intention of being present at the Inquest I Am Dinner Meet.

The next meeting will be held March 9th. There will be no meeting March 23d on account of the dinner the Saturday before.

A Good Scheme.

Here's a really good scheme that is offered by Myron Wells. When he writes his practise scripts, he uses news (sometimes called "mill") paper, cut into sheets about four by five inches. He writes but one scene on each and he can shift scenes, alter them, rewrite them, or do anything he wants with them. After he thinks he has done all he can, then he puts it on the regular typewriter paper and sends it out, but meantime he has his material in such shape that no alteration or change to a scene musses up all the rest of the script. For those who still need to work over their material, it is one of the best schemes we have met with. If there is a print shop in your neighborhood, you might arrange to get trimmings from odd stock cut to the size you require for almost nothing. For those who write in longhand we think that a five by seven sheet would be handier, but the size is not the essential part, that essential is the fact that you can change your scenes at will with never a thought that each material change means a fresh copy. It is an idea we wish we had thought of ourselves.

The Essanay at Niles, by George G. Cantwell, Editor.

This company, under the management of Mr. J. J. Robbins, is now housed in their brand new glass studio at Niles, California, 30 miles south of San Francisco, and is probably the largest motion picture studio under one roof in the West.

With the big expanse of glass in the studio proper, almost any interior set is possible; the company at present, being at work on several three- and four-reel feature subjects that are going to attract much attention.

Special electric light installation will enable the force to practically be independent of weather conditions.

The scenic advantages around Niles for picturesque settings are ideal for the work, with its rugged canyons, rolling hills and beautiful valleys.

Should city scenes or water stuff be needed, an hour's ride takes the troupe to San Francisco and the Golden Gate.

While the Essanay Company make a specialty of Western pictures, stories of the great out-doors in all its moods are wanted. Good, clean, wholesome drama, with thrilling situations and a live story are always in demand, but cheap "heroics" and "mellow" melodrama will be barred.

While gun plays may be necessary in some stories, do not hold the story to this idea alone, and the less killing and robbing in the action, the more likely the chance of an acceptance by the company.

Comedy-drama, as well as comedy, in both straight and farce, are especially wanted at the present time.

In a general way, Director Lloyd Ingraham, prefers light dramas and comedy-dramas, featuring Miss Reina Valdez, Evelyn Selbie, True Boardman and Carl Stockdale.

Director Roy Clements at present is busy with comedy and farce, with Victor Potel, Margaret Joslin and Harry Todd in the "Slippery Slim" and "Snakeville" series.

While Mr. G. M. Anderson as a rule, furnishes his own stories for the "Broncho Billy" pictures, he is not averse to accepting a good idea from others. Miss Marguerite Clayton is his leading lady.

Everybody is able to ride, but there are no Diving Girls in the lot.

The scenario department has been given special attention, and is in charge of Mr. Geo. G. Cantwell, as editor, where all scripts are read and passed upon. Those rejected are returned at once, and any of merit are later taken up with the various directors, and those found available are purchased at the market price.

It may be of interest to contributors to know that any delay in the return of their manuscripts, as a rule, is an indication that their story is being favorably considered.

In regard to the KIND of a story we want: there is practically no restriction in this, for an available IDEA may come to us in most any guise, and as few writers are able to furnish a working script, it is suggested that beginners furnish a full SYNOPSIS only, say of 300 to 500 words. This will have as good chances of sale as a full scenario and save lots of trouble for both the writer and the editor.

Any requests for information MUST be accompanied by a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

We Are Not Mad.

Now and then someone tries to "scald" us for being so nawsty and unpleasant generally, but now and then someone else sees that we are not merely doing it to be unpleasant. We've even been accused of insulting those we have sought to help, and so it is pleasant to get a letter like this one from Myron E. Wells:

> After six months' pegging away at scenarios, I begin to feel like I did when I graduated from college; i. e., that I don't know much after all. I have always felt that a fellow was getting along some when he got that far.
> I enjoyed very much your "How to Become an Author," in the issue of February 7th, but, gee, how the shafts of sarcasm did cut. It remained, however, for the most important lesson from this article, to come to me later on. I got a scenario back a few days ago, and there were so many things wrong in it that I felt like writing the editor and begging his pardon for having bothered him with it; but I didn't for his sake and his time. However, in going over this scenario I was so forcibly reminded of your article again that I hunted it out and read it through once more, this time finding a lot more shafts that did not get through the hide the first time. Let 'em come, Sargent, they do us a lot of good even if they do hurt when they strike. I know I have been wasting postage—but—and especially so since the editors don't give the slightest intimation as to WHY. The slips that Essanay used once helped some, i. e., a list of reasons for rejection printed and a check mark at those applying.

Now we thought that "How to Become an Author" was a pretty mild and nicely behaved story, one without a kick in it, but Mr. Wells sees some shafts of sarcasm in it, and perhaps there were, but there is a reason. We do not hate the whole photoplay world and we are not mad at them for any reason. To the contrary, we want to help them all we can, but a long time since we found out that it did no good merely to hand out sage advice.

A large number of our readers are graduates of the schools, and they have been told that they are the best little writers on earth, and they believe it. A lot more know without being told that they are good. All are wrapped in an armor of self-content so impenetrable that in comparison a chilled steel safe looks like the stuff they fill charlotte russes with. We must take a can opener and pull off that armor before we can make the slightest impression, and we do it, not because we hate the writers, but because we like them and want to help them, and we know we must husk them a little before we can get to the core.

We have been through the mill ourselves. We have been kicked and cuffed into line and we know how much it hurts, but we know, too, that unless these raps are given there is no progress, and so we are writing with what the bromides call a "vitrolic" pen, merely because that is the only kind of ink to use on armor plate.

Recently an other writer complained that we were doing our pretty best to discourage the novice and hinted that soon we would have all the novices discouraged and so would have no one to write to. Bless his lovin' li'l thoughtful heart, you can't kill the man who is bound to write, and the others ought to be killed; the people who talk about their "rights" and all the rest of them. We are writing this department for the greatest good of the bunch, and we are, perhaps, to be excused if we think that we may know a shade more about it than some of the complainants. We can do no one any good until they get into the frame of mind that Mr. Wells represents, but once they waken to the fact that the man who has written three scripts that all his friends say are good, is not a writer, they are hopeless. Personally we are the mildest-mannered, bald-headed cuss you ever saw, and we are not mean because we like to be mean. We are doing the best we can for you, so please, Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Writer, realize that and read the straight word and realize that it hurts us more than it does you—and that right after a remark about bromides!

Tap! Tap! Tap!

Scene 25.—"I DON'T LOVE YOU."

Pier.

Adam and Hilda discovered—he proposes to her earnestly and almost hopelessly, she says no—putting her friendly hand in his—he is pleading, when she looks over towards "The Wanda"—involuntarily says leader—Adam looks also. Cut to;

Scene 26.—The Houseboat.

Glimpse of Forbes in row-boat leaving for pier.

Scene 27.—DILEMMA.

Pier.

Forbes comes from boat and Hilda welcomes him so that Adam, watching—has no longer doubt. Hilda looks from one to other—then simply and naturally turns to Forbes, puts her hand on his shoulder and looks back at Adam, showing she has made her choice. Forbes glances uneasily towards "The Wanda"—shows he is in a dilemma—doesn't know quite what to do—Adam notes this—and going toward him eyes him steadily. As the two men face each other—eye to eye—Adam searches for Forbes' motives—shows threat if evil comes to Hilda—and turning to her—holds out his hand—she slowly places hers in it. With a last warning look at Forbes he enters his fishing boat and rows off, down the river showing resignation. (Note: Scene 27 to 30 to be cut "ad lib" in joining room.)

Scene 28.—Deck of houseboat.
Mrs. Forbes looking toward shore very much out of temper. Makes up mind—calls sailors—gives orders to go down the river—bustle in preparation to raise anchors. Mother takes megaphone and calls peremptorally. Cut to:

Scene 29.—Hilda distracted by Forbes' nervous attempts to check her demonstrations of affection, as he hears and sees his mother with megaphone. Forbes hesitates before registering decision—then doggedly forms megaphone of hands and calls that he is coming, evidently recognizing he had better get out of the situation. Shame-faced he bids Hilda a hasty good bye and brushes past her to get into boat. Hilda's braid catches on the button of his sleeve. Mechanically she tears the braid away. Forbes into boat and off. Hilda stunned, dazed.

Scene 30.—"I WANT TO SAVE YOU FROM YOURSELF."
Deck of houseboat, already in motion.
Forbes and mother apart from guests but keenly observed by Evelyn. Forbes is reluctantly convinced and with a last look back toward Hilda and with evident effort crosses to Evelyn and begins to talk to her in constrained manner.

Scene 31.—DESERTED.
Pier.
Hilda still standing as though stunned.

Scene 32.—Flash of houseboat in far distance moving slowly down stream.

Scene 33.—Pier.
Hilda reaches both arms imploringly toward the parting boat.

Scene 34.—TAP—TAP—TAP!
(Moonlight). Deck of houseboat moving slowly along or anchored elsewhere. Gay party on deck. Forbes seated on rail near Evelyn chatting. He looks down on the water shining in the moonlight becomes distrait. Evelyn annoyed at his lack of attention tap—tap—taps with the end of her fan on the railing. (Note: Tempo of tapping slow like the tapping of Daddy's cane.) Forbes apparently does not notice tapping—but leans gazing intently at the water.

Scene 35.—Section of moonlit water.
Dissolve in and out—Hilda's head with hair floating about her as she smiled at Forbes in scene 20. Cut back to.

Scene 36.—Deck of houseboat.
Evelyn still tapping with her fan and looking at Forbes with great displeasure. He starts, collects himself, attention caught by the tapping fan; he reaches out nervously—checks Evelyn's mechanical tapping.

Scene 37.—AFTER DAYS OF LONELINESS AND LONGING HOPE IS DEAD.
Interior of hulk.
Daddy is dozing in chair, toddy-mug in front of him and cane between his knees. Hilda very despondent and unhappy sits at the table thinking, looking toward window. Double exposure—dissolve in outside of window of Forbes in evening clothes as seen in window in scene 19. Vision fades out and Hilda's head droops. Suddenly she raises head, tense determined registers decision with cautious look toward father, gets paper and ink out of table-drawer and writes letter. Daddy rises, says good-night and stumps out of room. Hilda looks after him and listens; registers with nods of head the tap—tap—tap of the old man's cane, resumes writing.

Scene 38.—(Moonlight.)
Flash of Forbes on deck of boat among merry friends. Back to:

Scene 39.—Interior of hulk.
Hilda reading her letter. Screen portion of letter:
"I CANNOT LIVE WITHOUT YOU. THE MERCY OF THE RIVER MAY BE GREATER THAN YOURS. I HEAR THE TAP—TAP—TAP OF DADDY'S CANE.—POOR DADDY.
Back to scene:
Hilda deliberately folds and puts letter in envelope addressed, ready, and stamped—takes a second sheet of paper and writing a line or two leaves it beside mug, then exits with long sad survey of room from doorway.

Scene 40.—Section of fishing hamlet street corner old-fashioned oil lamp-post with mail box on it. Scene so dark that while action can be seen but nothing else clearly except light of lamp. Hilda enters—with finality of motion—she puts the letter in box—exits.

Scene 41.—The old pier. Dark night.
Hilda approaches, jumps in a boat at side of pier near the end—deliberately throws oars onto the pier and unfastens the rope and pushes the boat along. The boat starts and a projecting beam strikes the back of Hilda's head as the boat moves under it. She staggers, presses both hands to head and falls across seat of boat unconscious. And the boat drifts outward and down the river.

Scene 42.—Forbes' study as in scene 4. Night, lamp on desk.
Forbes at desk is distracted—registers retrospective thoughts and sighs, student lamp lighted.

Scene 43.—Flash of river—night light.
Hilda's form lying huddled across seat in drifting boat.

Scene 44.—TO THE NETS. ?
(Gray light of daybreak.)
Exterior of humble fisherman's cottage on river bank.
Adam in fisherman's rig, high boots, etc.—opens door—comes from house and exits from scene. His mother is seen through door which he leaves open.

Scene 45.—Interior hulk.
Daddy enters from room—calls—no answer—puzzled—goes to table, seeing note picks it up and reads. (Screen):
"I'M GOING AWAY FOREVER—CANNOT TELL YOU MORE—GOOD-BYE, DEAR, DEAR DADDY."
Poor Daddy dazed—staring before him.

Scene 46.—River.
Fish net leaders stretched from poles. Hilda's boat has been caught in the net.

Scene 47.—"SHE'S GONE TO THE CITY TO THAT MAN—I MUST TRY TO FIND HER."
Interior hulk.
Daddy as before—gives leader registering determination.

Scene 48.—River. Net as in scene 46.
Adam comes rowing into scene—looking in horror at Hilda in boat—sees she is not dead, starts to lift her out. Cut to:

Scene 49.—Pier near hulk.
Daddy getting in boat—pulls off.

Scene 50.—Exterior Adam's cottage.
He enters carrying Hilda in his arms, she is still unconscious—at his call his mother comes to the door—exclaims in pity and they enter cottage.

Scene 51.—Steamer dock as in scene 6.
Daddy arriving at wharf in small boat as steamer docks facing down river.

Prize Schemes.

Keep away from prize schemes. One recent one announces that all scripts submitted, accepted and not winning a prize will be paid for at the company's rate. In several instances it appears that the company's rate is $10 for a thoroughly professional script. In other words, someone will get $200, and perhaps a thousand dollars worth of stuff will be purchased for a hundred. Can you see where you will win?

At best the prize contest ties up a script even longer than some regular companies hold them, and for this reason we do not even like that Cines contest idea, though unquestionably the Cines contest will be conducted absolutely without fraud of any sort.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

M. S. T.—There seems to be little or no interest in the matter. Not even a single inquiry.

A. C. H.—We are sorry, but we do not know what the editor means when he asks for more scenes with "class." It's a new one on us. It is not a common studio phrase. It is possible that he is asking for some lighter scenes to relieve the heavy, but that is merely guesswork.

J. McC.—Sorry, but the Answers Man cannot undertake to get a house in Troy to run pictures of your trouble play. If you have a scene in a forthcoming release, how is it you do not know the name? This is not the press agent's column, you know.

C. B. L.—"Plot does not appear," as one of the studio bromides. It later all needs that the story is told the way that the studio producer sees. Twenty-three assists to a thirty-scene script. You ought to enjoy the reaction of any story. Please explain with a line what you mean by a combination of inserts appearing two or three scenes in advance of their proper place." It certainly seems that such a procedure would destroy the continuity. Better to send directly West.

F. B. M.—On the leased side Edwin August has played with Rosemary Lubin and Vitagraph. He had the title role in His Lordship Buys Stock."

RUBEENA.—Hope you enjoyed the picture. Seems like a pretty outdoor. Miss Cissell seems to be with Essanay though we have not seen her cast lately. Cines pictures are made in Italy.

R. J. H.—We do not know how long it requires for Essanay to pay off on a release. It might take a couple of weeks if the rock sister happens to be away. Wait a month and then query. Don't worry in the meantime. Most companies do cast their plays to their greatest matter. It takes up too much film on the screen. We do not understand that American is now releasing in Chicago. The companies mentioned are buying, though taking little from the general market. They are always open for the really good script.

R. D. P.—It is not customary to acknowledge the receipt of a manuscript. It would cost the leading companies several thousand dollars a year to extend this simple courtesy. Let a script be eight weeks and then, if you wish, send in a polite inquiry. A lengthy stay is generally a favorable augury, but not always. It at least shows that the script is being considered.

M. G. R.—Mr. Kerrigan is working in Los Angeles. Miss Ethel Cooke was the leading woman in "What Might Have Been." Miss Balcom was the lead in "L'Article 47." Joe King was John Vance in "The Missionary and the Actress."

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Important Notice.

IT is impossible to reply to letters through the department in less than two weeks and sometimes three. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents in stamps to cover cost will receive a carbon copy of the department reply by mail immediately.

The first 74 questions are now in print in neat booklet form and may be obtained by remitting twenty-five cents, money or stamps, to the editor.

Question No. 23.

Best answers will be published and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Explicit permission to use the name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used.

Suppose one of your armature coils burned in two, or became disconnected right in the middle of a show. Tell us what you would do; also, give probable cause of the trouble. Explain, in detail, the things which might cause a compound-wound generator to refuse to pick up its load, even though running mechanically perfect.

Roll of Honor on Question No. 17.

All but one of you seem to have fallen down on that part of question 17, which deals with the grounding of the generator. Nobody but Ernest D. Wills, Brookings, S. Dak., seems to have thought of looking in the National Electric Code, which governs in matters of this kind. I was rather astonished at the diversity of opinion, and the wide range of reasons given for and against grounding. Various correspondents dealt with static, electrolysis, induced current, and many other things. L. B. Minges, Lestershire, N. Y., came pretty close to it, as he would ground for anything under 500 volts. Taking it by and large brother Wills again swipes the pie, captures the glory and gives you the Merry Haw, Haw! While none of the other replies were correct as to the insulating matter, still the following are entitled to be on the Roll of Honor, and were, for the most part, correct in other portions of their reply, though every one of you made some mistakes. Now, gentlemen, get busy and don't let brother Wills run off with the whole works; he is getting too darn chesty. The roll of honor on question 17 is: W. B. Minges, Lestershire, N. Y.; W. S. James, Camden, N. J.; Chicago, Ill., (5), all members of No. 2; L. C. LaGrow, Albany, N. Y.; Harry S. Dobson, Toronto, Canada; Fort Worth, Texas; L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada; W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada; Boston, Mass.; Seattle, Wash.; St. Joseph, Mo.; and Cleveland, Ohio (3).

Answer to Question No. 17,

By Ernest D. Willis, Brookings, South Dakota.

The question:

Would you or would you not ground the frame of your motor, your generator, or your motor-generator? Explain, in detail, reasons for your answer. What is a "ground" as applied to an armature or a field coil, and what is the effect of each? Give method which may be applied by the average operator for testing for armature and field coil grounds. If you are using 35 amperes d. c., the current being 110 volts, how many additional h.p. must the engine exert at the power plant, or your own engine if an isolated plant, when you are using your arc, and how much of this power is used in actual production of light at the arc? Where does the rest go? What difference would it make if the supply were a. c.? What difference would it make if the current were 70 volt? If it were 220?

The answer:

The National Electrical Code recommends all motors or generators 550 volts and under to be insulated from the ground, and all over this voltage to be grounded. When you ground your set the insulation and the liability of the entire system to ground depends upon the insulation of your machine. If there is one ground present in a system, a second ground will at once cause trouble, while if there were no grounds in the first place the acquired ground would not cause trouble. In some places the secondaries of the transformers are grounded so as to protect life and property in case the transformer breaks down and allows the primary voltage to be impressed upon the secondary. If such is the case and you are using alternating current, a grounded machine frame will at once cause trouble as soon as a local ground shows up in the machine. Suppose your frame is grounded and through this, of course, you are protected from shocks while touching the frame yourself, but you are never able to tell how soon a ground may take place upon the outside circuit impressing high enough voltage upon the insulation of your machine, causing it to break down. I would advise insulating the frame if for no other reason than that if there is one ground the chances are a hundred to one there will be another.

When any of the wiring on an armature or field coil either makes a good metallic connection or, due to weak insulation, forms an arc with the metal of the machine, a "ground" is said to be formed. One ground will not cause trouble, but if, for instance, you have two grounds in the field coils, then, due to the grounded path having less resistance, some of the coils will receive little or no current. If there are two grounds in the armature some of the coils will be short circuited and the result will be observed on the voltmeter; also if an iron bar is held near the revolving armature it will vibrate as the bad coil or coils pass. The coils on the machine will also be heated. One ground in the armature and one ground in the field will cause part of the field coils to be weaker than others and the machine will show uneven running. Start the machine running with a slight load and run till machine is warmed up, then connect one side of a voltmeter to the frame and the other side to one of the terminals. Now, if you get a deflection more than 1/20 the terminal voltage of the machine, and it remains fairly steady, you can be sure there is a ground in the field coils near the other terminal. If you get no deflection, however, or a very small one, connect the voltmeter between the other terminal and the frame and see what results. If the deflection is not steady, but is vibratory, you can assume, with a fair degree of certainty, that it is an armature ground. If, after this elimination test, you decide the ground is in the field coils, disconnect them from each other and connect one side of the lighting circuit (110 volts) to the frame the other side of the circuit through a voltmeter to either wire of the field coil. If a decided deflection is produced you have found the trouble. Proceed in the same manner with the rest of the coils. An electric bell may be used instead of the voltmeter, using several dry cells instead of the lighting circuit or a telephone receiver may be used instead of the bell. A magneto testing set is also good if you have one. Grounds in the armature make themselves manifest by the voltmeter fluctuations, or by the vibrating of a piece of iron held near the revolving armature as the bad coils pass by; also by excessive heating. If you cannot find the short circuited coils by superficial examination, the best thing to do is to make the bar to bar test. A direct current controlled by a lamp bank is sent into the armature and a millivolt-meter or a galvanometer is connected to adjacent bars around the commutator. The average deflection will soon be found. Then as you proceed testing adjacent bars, and you reach a point of little or no deflection you have a short circuited coil or coils, and by moving the wires of the voltmeter further apart the number of coils short circuited by the grounds can be found.

And now for the other portions of the question: the d. c. arc operates at about 48 volts and since, in the example proposed, the amperage is 35, the power for light alone is $35\times48=1680$ watts. But with 110 volts on the line the power registered at the meter will be $110\times35=3850$ watts. We then have a difference of $3850-1680=2170$ watts, which is used up in heat in the coils of the rheostat or other controlling device. The h.p. necessary for the arc is the total wattage $3850\div746=5.1$ h.p. In the case of a. c. the arc voltage would be 35 instead of 48 and we would have to use more current when using a. c. than when using d. c. With the same resistance in the rheostat, since the resistance of the arc is less, therefore the resistance of the circuit is less, so that the amperage would be $110-35\div1.8=41.6$ amperes, 1.8 ohms being resistance of rheostat to deliver 35 amperes d. c. at arc. Watts taken from line, $41.6\times110=4576$. Watts at arc $35\times41.6=1456$; difference equals 3120 watts which is consumed in the rheostat and appears in the form of heat. If the voltage were 70, arc consumption would be 1680 watts as before. Line watts equals $70\times35=2450$; difference equals 770 watts into heat. If voltage were 220, arc consumption being the same, 1680 watts. Line watts equals $220\times35=7700$, difference equals 6020 watts into heat.

The only error I find in Brother Wills' reply is where he says "or other controlling device." This is incorrect; a d. c. to d. c. economizer has a very decided loss, but only a very small portion of it shows up in the form of heat. With a. c. there is almost no loss at all if an efficient economizer be used. Brother Wills' reply is very excellent indeed insofar as it applies to resistance, but as I understand him he recommends grounding in defiance of the National Code and this is entirely wrong. Had he simply remarked that he personally believed the code rule to be wrong; no one could possibly object, but a recommendation is quite different and Brother Wills was very wrong in making it. The code is the law in such matters and it must govern.

An Excellent Little Book.

The Nicholas Power Company has put out a very neat little leather-covered booklet, entitled "Hints to Operators." This work is supplied gratis upon application, and it is well worth writing for. In the back is a pocket for the operator's license card. It also contains a fund of useful information in convenient form, mainly on the care and adjustment of the Power's Six mechanism. The credit for this little work is due Mr. William Smith, assistant general manager of the Power Company.

A Fine Piece of Work.

Chas. D. Armstrong, Majestic Theater, Ashland, Wisconsin, writes as follows:

> Introducing myself as a "student" operator. I am mailing drawing illustrating the theory for determining the size of picture, equivalent focus, size of aperture, or length of throw with relation to the projection upon the screen. I also attach thereto my reasonings, determined from the sketch, or, in other words, "the cause for why" relative to rules for the different determinations.
> In defense I wish to say that I have never studied physics, or anything else directly bearing upon this subject, except that I have "digested" from your Handbook. The sketch is strictly original and I submit it in part as an illustration of my method or system of study. On page 360 of the Handbook you give the formula for determining the equivalent focus (size of picture you say, which is a typographical error) in substance as follows: "Multiply the length of throw in feet, by the width of the aperture in fractions of an inch, and divide this result by the width of the picture you desire, in feet." Accepting this as correct I wanted to know the "cause for why" of this rule, and the sketch I present is the product of my endeavor to ascertain the fundamental base of this rule. To enable readers to understand the sketch I will say that the point I endeavor to bring out is that the size of the picture is increased once over the size of the aperture to each time the length of the throw is increased over the equivalent focus of the lens. In the sketch I have illustrated, in figures and words, the actual working out of the formula for determining the size of the picture. The methods for determining any of the other quantities are as readily deduced. The drawing is based on a lens with a surface of a four-inch sphere, four-inch equivalent focus and an aperture of one inch. The length of throw is extended in inches, but would eventually progress into feet if the extensions were continued. However, what is shown is sufficient to illustrate my point. In closing I will give a

DEDUCTION OF RULES.

Theory Expressed in Sketch, to Find the Following:

Equivalent focus. The size of the picture divided by the size of the aperture gives the number of times the length of the throw is increased over the equivalent focus, hence the equivalent focus is equal to the number of times this amount is contained in the length of the throw.

Rule: Equivalent focus equals size of picture divided by size of aperture contained times in length of throw.

Size of picture. The length of throw divided by the equivalent focus gives the number of times the size of the picture is increased over the size of the aperture, hence the size of the picture is equal to this amount times the size of the aperture.

Rule: Size of picture equals length of throw divided by the equivalent focus times size of aperture.

Size of aperture. The length of throw divided by the equivalent focus gives the number of times the size of the picture is increased over the size of the aperture, hence the size of the aperture is equal to the number of times this amount is contained times in the size of the picture.

Rule: Size of aperture equals length of throw divided by the equivalent focus contained times in size of picture.

Length of throw: The size of the picture divided by the size of the aperture gives the number of times the length of the throw is increased over the equivalent focus, hence the length of the throw is equal to this amount times the equivalent focus.

Rule: The length of throw equals size of the picture divided by the size of the aperture times equivalent focus.

As coming from an operator, this is indeed a remarkable piece of work. The drawing would not do discredit to a regular mechanical draughtsman, and this is no idle compliment. It is certainly encouraging to know we have men in operating rooms who can sit down and reason out, and not only reason out, but illustrate an argument and a proposition such as this, with nothing to go on, except the rule or rules quoted in a handbook. I very much doubt if I could have done it myself. Brother Armstrong is herewith added to the roster of names of operators whom I regard as distinctly progressive high-class men. He has stepped into the class with Woods and Dolliver, of San Francisco, Cal.; James, of Camden, N. J.; Smith, of Fort Worth, Texas; Day, of Sherman, Texas; Griffiths, of Ansonia, Conn.; Wills, of Brookings, So. Dakota; La Grow, of Albany, N. Y.; Johnston, of Canada, and others. (Now that "others" includes quite a few, so those of you who know I think well of you and whose names are not included please don't get insulted. I simply named a few I happened to think of first.) And by the way, while I think of it, progressive managers who want high-class results will do well to watch the Roll of Honor on the questions now being propounded. Men who have the enterprise, progressiveness and ability to answer the questions I am asking will, I think, prove to be without exception good men. In the first place, they already possess knowledge, or are willing to dig down and get it when the way is pointed out to them. The fact that they do possess knowledge presumes that they are men of brains and ability, and it also proves they are not lazy, and those two things form a large proportion of the necessary ingredients of the high-class operator who can find and will produce results. A great many readers of the department would like to answer these questions, but they love their ease too well to get out and hustle and dig up the answers for themselves, and the lazy man never did and never will make a high-class operator. Now, please don't misunderstand me. I don't mean to say that failure to answer these questions, or attempt to answer them, is any proof that a man is not a good operator, or even a high-class operator, but, on the other hand, the fact that a man does answer them, or makes a stab at it anyhow, goes a long way to prove that he is, or will be, a mighty good man in an operating room.

From Greenwood.

James Surlson, Greenwood, South Carolina, writes:

> Have not seen anything in our department from this neck of the woods, therefore, this letter. I am running a Simplex, taking a.c. through a Fort Wayne compensarc, with good results. I added considerably to the brilliancy of my picture by perforating the flicker blade of my shutter, filling it full of small holes with an ordinary punch. Removed the regular blade, and made another one just like it out of metal so as to keep the regular machine shutter as it was.

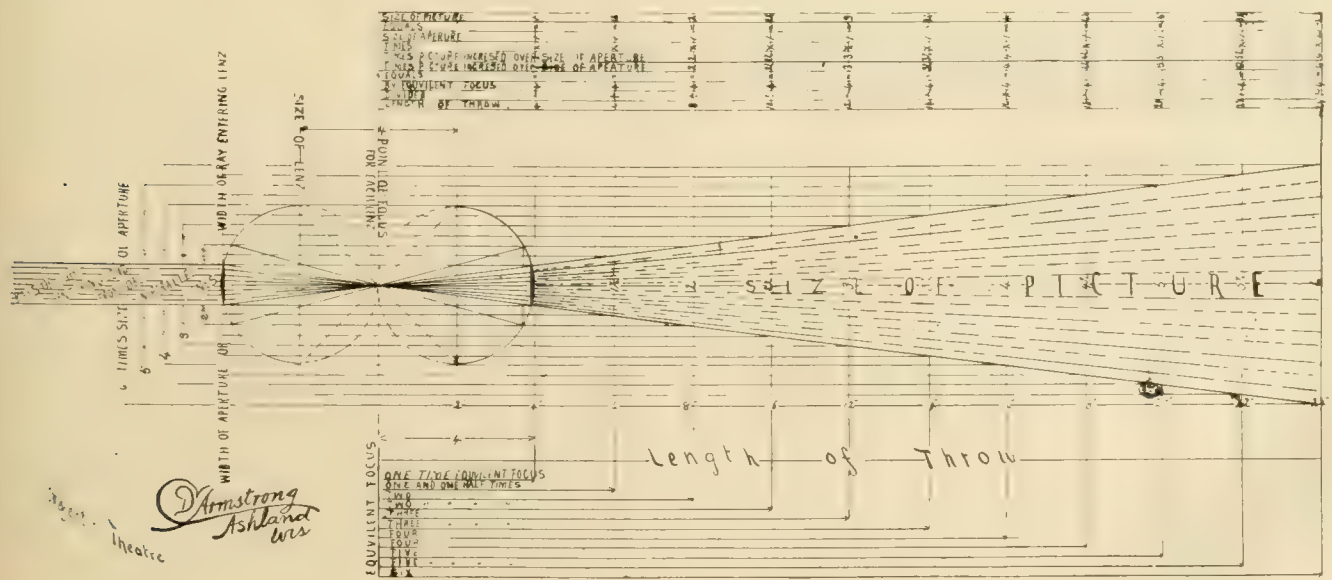
Glad to hear from you, Brother Surlson, though I think the benefit of perforating the shutter is, if you will pardon me, largely imaginary. That stunt has been tried out and discarded long ago. For one thing, any light thrown on the screen during the dark period tends to injure the highlight of the picture. The Edison Company used a perforated flicker blade for a long time, on the theory that it reduced flicker, but they have, I believe, abandoned that particular scheme and come back to the solid blade.

Theater Heating.

H. E. Briggs, Deerwood Theater, Crosby, Minnesota, asks our opinion as to the following:

> What do you think about a hot air plant for theater heating, the auditorium being 25 x 100 feet? Knowing that it would cost more to intsall it, would it cost less for operation? I know what the heating company's man would tell me, but would like to know the experience of others.

I would rather refer this particular matter to managers who have had experience, and would request them to write friend Briggs direct. Personally, I believe it costs a little more in fuel to operate a hot air plant than it does to operate either steam or hot water, but in my opinion there is a large advantage in the fact that the hot air plant supplies a great deal of ventilation; it brings the fresh air in from the outside constantly, whereas steam heat or hot water does not do anything of the sort. However, I admit I have had no personal experience with the two, when it comes to their application in theater heating.



Concerning Question No. 10.

Stillwater, New York, sends in the following:

> In commenting on the reply of L. C. LaGrow to question 10, January 24th issue, with regard to that part of his statement concerning the peculiarity of the winding of some generators, you say you would like a little more detailed explanation. Of course, it is up to Brother LaGrow to supply this, and I suppose he will, he being apparently well qualified to do so, as is made evident by his most excellent answers, so far, to the questions. Still I don't think it would be any harm for us who are just beginning to learn to give our explanation, to the end that if we are in the wrong we may be set right.
> The attached tracing illustrates my understanding of this matter. Sketch No. 1 shows the theory, and Nos. 2 and 3 the actual practice. Sketch No. 2 has its proportions drawn wrong in order to make it clear. The dead part of the wire is drawn very long and the active part very short, while in the actual winding it is just the reverse. Sketch No. 3 is not drawn to suit me, but is the best I could do. If you can understand it my purpose will have been accomplished. It shows a ring winding with eight coils and eight commutator bars. In winding the armature the wire is laid on in a continuous spiral, as shown. It will be noticed that the complete winding can > be divided into two parts, as shown, one influenced by the N-pole and the other by the S-pole. When looked at from the commutator end the N-pole side moving upward has e.m.f. in direction from back to front of armature through the inductors; the S-pole side has e.m.f. in direction from back to front of armature through the dead wire. The e.m.f. in each half of the armature is in series and current flows from one coil to the other, except at the points where the N-half and the S-half of the armature meet. Here the e.m.fs. meet, or oppose, and if wires were connected to the winding at this point for an instant the two oppossing e.m.fs. would both force current out into the wire at the top of the armature, and draw it in at the bottom, as shown by the direction of the arrows. Now, if the junctions of the coils are connected to eight commutator bars, one coil to each bar, and the ends of the external circuit be connected by brushes to the commutator bars half way between the poles, each half of the armature separately generates an e.m.f. and delivers current to the external circuit. If I am not right in this I shall look forward to being corrected by some of our department fans.

Stillwater, this may sound like a bluff, but I literally have not the time to dope this out just now. I am giving it as you put it, and when it is in print I will sit down and study the matter some evening, and come to a thorough understanding of it. At first glance, however, the thing looks reasonable, and I should say that you have given a very lucid explanation, and that your solution is probably correct.

Picture Moves.

Clyde Stakebake, Winchester, Indiana, says:

> I am projecting a picture 58 feet on a mirror screen with a Power's Six-A, and have trouble with the picture moving up and down and sideways on the screen. Intermittent is apparently properly adjusted and seems to have no play either way. At times the picture is steady and there is very little motion, but again it will move as much as four to six inches on the screen.

From what you say I am inclined to think a part of the trouble is due to a dirty intermittent sprocket. The least bit of dirt on the face of the sprocket will cause a jump, therefore, wash the same with kerosene every day, using an ordinary tooth brush. See that the top gate rollers hug the film reasonably tight, stretching the springs, if necessary, to accomplish this. Possibly some of the movement is in the films themselves, as some of the manufacturers have not yet succeeded in perfecting their sprocket perforations, but a jump of six inches is terrible. Be sure that your tension springs are tight enough. Study the Power's Six instructions in the Handbook closely. If the intermittent sprocket has no end play, then none of the fault lies there, since if the shaft was sprung, or the sprocket itself out of round the film would jump all the time. As to your last question: You will have to take that up with the Nicholas Power Company, 90 Gold Street, New York City. I think they will take care of you as the Power's machines are or were put out with a year's guarantee.

Screen Color.

Harry H. Finney, Convent, Louisiana, wants to know if light green alabastine on light canvas is as good as white. Says he has no black border on his screen, which is in a college hall seating 500. Also inquires if a cracked condenser will make any difference in the light. Friend Finney is in a college where a few films are run every Sunday evening.

As to the light green, I, myself, would prefer the plain white alabastine with a border of black. I am not a believer in those various screen "dopes." I think the benefit derived through their use is not only largely, but entirely imaginary. I have never seen anything which I thought equalled the plain white screen. It depends on how the lens is cracked; a straight crack does not seem to make much difference, provided the two halves will stay in place. There is, of course—there must be—some difference, but not sufficient to be visible to the naked eye.

Carrying Reels.

Again we must call attention to an abuse of long standing and one which this department has spoken of before, viz.: The carrying of reels. The manager should understand when he employs an operator that he is employing a man to take charge of his operating room, and project upon the screen of his theater results upon which will depend to a large extent, the receipts at his box office. Yet the average manager seems to think that this man ought to be a sort of a combination operator and errand boy. Just where he gets that idea from I don't know, and I guess nobody else does either. It is no more reasonable and right to expect the operator to go to the film exchange, or to the express office and get the films than it would be to demand that he paint the theater or scrub the floor or go to the coal yard and lug the coal with which to feed the theater furnace. The excuse that "the operator understands he was to carry the reels when he was employed," is no excuse at all. It simply means that the poor chap was forced into submitting to an abuse in order to procure a position. Managers ought to be more fair minded than to demand any such thing as this. In large cities this carrying of reels is a very serious matter to the operator. I know of cases right here in New York where operators are obliged to start the first show at 9 a.m. and work through an eight-hour grind, but before they enter upon this grind, which is hard enough in all conscience, they are obliged to go to a film exchange and get the reels. Now, sometimes these men live from five to ten miles from the theater, and they have to pass right by the theater and go three or four miles further to the exchange, and then come back, which means that instead of working eight hours they are working nearer ten. And does the manager offer them anything extra for this service he has put upon them? Well, not so you could notice it! Instead of doing this too many managers put up a terrific howl because they are obliged to pay their operator for ten hours' work, fully two-thirds the sum they would have to pay a bricklayer for eight hours. Good managers don't do these things. They realize the fact that their box office income depends to a very large extent upon the class of work turned out by their operators, and they also realize the fact that if the operator really turns out high-class work he has got all any one man can possibly attend to, right there in his operating room and that anything demanded of him outside of his operating room duties will mean a lowering of the standard of the results he puts on the screen, because the man will be overworked. That is not any fairy tale, but just good, hard, sound, horse sense.

Six hours of a steady grind is as much as any operator can stand, and continue to stand it for any length of time and put perfect results on the screen. Accepting this as a fact, and it is a fact, one sees how utterly unreasonable managers are who demand six to eight hours' service of their operators, and top that off by a further demand for reel carrying. But aside from all that it is not an operator's business to carry reels, no matter whether he works eight hours or two hours a day. The operator is an operator, not an errand boy.

From Mudlavia.

B. F. Hittle writes from Kramer, Indiana, where is located the Mudlavia Sanitarium. He says:

> For the past four years I have been connected with a little storeroom theater, and during that time, through the aid of the department and the Handbook, have been able to head off trouble in connection with projection, wherefore you have my sincere thanks. During that time I was located at Attica, Ind. I am now in the employ of the Mudlavia Bath Institution. The theater building was built for a chapel and is being remodeled and is to be known as the Mudlavia Orpheum. Equipment will be of the very best. I have never used a transformer and would like to ask if it would improve the light at the arc. We have our own power plant, 110 volt d.c., so that the saving of current is no object. For certain reasons it is imperative that I have a screen which will roll. Can you give me directions for making one which will not check or peel?

A transformer cannot be used on d.c. On page 183 of the second edition of the Handbook you will find a d.c. to d.c. economizer described, but if current saving is no object its installation would not benefit you. As to the curtain, I would suggest the installation of one of the patent screens, and I will have literature sent to you describing the same. Otherwise the paint described on page 338 of the Handbook will probably serve as well as anything.

Cheap Men.

J. Kresh, New York City, writes:

> Will you express your opinion of operators who call upon managers and seek to secure a position by offering to work below the scale the present operator is receiving.

It is hardly necessary to express my opinion of this proposition, Brother Kresh, because it has already been set forth a great many times. I am absolutely out of sympathy with anything of that kind, and I think the progressive manager is out of sympathy with it also. It is a step backward. The operator who has ability, and has demonstrated that ability, does not have to do anything of that sort, and the manager who employs a man who seeks to secure a position on those terms is very foolish indeed. He is more than likely to regret his bargain. The cheap man is seldom or never really cheap. Real ability demands decent remuneration, and gets it, too. The man who comes along trying to secure a position by undermining, or, putting it broadly, cutting the throat of another man, certainly is one who has very little principle. If he would thus "do" his fellow operator, he would also "do" his employer if he got the chance. That is a proposition a blind man could see. I take it your manager did not accept the services of the man in question. By so doing he showed his good sense, and demonstrated the fact that he is wise in his generation.

Should Be Spanked.

Alfred A. Criswell, Camden, New Jersey, writes:

With regard to L. C. LaGrow's article, page 800, February 14th issue: the article by my friend, W. S. James, says that the rays appear to spread, not actually spread. The sketch which I am enclosing, by courtesy of brother James, shows the reason for this appearance. In the near future it is the intention of friend James to submit a photograph illustrating this. Mr. James understands that the diffused light not only causes flicker, but also a hazy or out-of-focus effect. You are requested to inform Brother LaGrow, that he will be severely spanked if he is not more careful in his statements in the future.

Not wishing to get my fingers burned, or my hair scorched, I think I will keep out of this. Of course, my real reason is that I don't know myself which one is right, but I don't want anybody to catch on to that fact. It is a state secret, and I would not tell anybody for the world, or in the world.

P. S. Kindly inform me when the spanking is pulled off and I will buy an orchestra seat, way down front in the bald-headed row. I can't see that that explanatory sketch explains very much.

Is With Us.

Cleveland, Ohio, sends in 25 cents for the questions and says:

All I need to say concerning your action in standing for better work on the part of the operator is that I am with you, and have myself been striving to that end ever since Local 160 was organized.

I have recently had several letters from members of 160 which were to all intents and purposes duplicates of the above. I am glad to receive these letters from Cleveland, because I have been led to believe that some of the members of 160 are still imbued with the idea that the dissemination of knowledge is injurious to their cause. I am sorry that this is the fact, because I believe that Local 160 is for the most part composed of good men, and men who are, according to the present standard, well up in their business, but the qualification "present standard" means considerable. I met President Hulburt at the convention at Seattle, and, while we differ in opinion on the matter of what is best for the operator, still Brother Hulburt impressed me as a man who is thoroughly honest, and is simply standing by his own convictions. I admire a man who will do this, even though he may differ with me. I think, also, that friend Hulburt, as well as other able men in 160, will change their views. I am sure that Mr. Hulburt can see through a knot hole just as well as the next man, and that his ideas concerning the work of the editor of this department are largely due to the fact that he has not taken a broad enough view of the situation. He does not, perhaps, realize that we cannot conscientiously claim that the work of the operator is of prime importance—that the box office receipts and the income upon an investment of many thousands of dollars depends very largely upon the excellence of the work turned out by the operator—and then, in the next breath, object to the promulgation of information, instruction and knowledge which will enable the operator to better his work. In other words, if the work of the operator is of no particular importance, then nobody carse two whoops in the new Jerusalem whether he is expert in his business or not, but if it is of prime importance then every man in the moving picture industry, including film producers, exchange men and theater managers, is vitally interested in the operator being taught everything he possibly can be taught which will tend to increase his knowledge and improve the result upon the screen. I want Brother Hulburt and others holding like views to retire to the depths of their closets, and there in peace, quiet and solitude study that proposition over. Think upon it deeply and, if necessary, prayerfully. You have got to lie down on one of the two things, gentlemen, or else stand convicted as willing to be unfair to the theater manager, to the exchange man, to the film producer as well as to the great public, millions of whom daily depend upon the excellence of the work of operators for their amusement, and for the return they get for the money paid in at the box office at 15,000 or more theaters.

Please understand, gentlemen, and Brother Hulburt in particular, that this is written in the kindest spirit. I have mentioned Mr. Hulburt by name because he did something in the convention which proved to me that he is thoroughly honest, therefore, I am moved to some extent to argue with him personally, though putting it in a way which will argue equally with other men who hold the same views, which are, I am compelled to say, non-progressive views. Hulburt is too good a man to take any such position as this. It is a position which neither he or any other man can maintain, therefore, the sooner it is vacated the better. I wish again to reiterate an oft' made statement of mine, viz.: That not more than one per cent. of the moving picture operators of this country and Canada are really thoroughly capable and competent, in all that that term implies, and please remember that one per cent. means one in a hundred. That is a big statement, but nevertheless it is an absolutely true statement. By this I don't mean that only 1 per cent, of the men are good operators, but, judging by results on the screen, I very much doubt if it can be shown (and I am liberal in this statement) that 25 per cent of the men are even good operators. That is to say, put fairly good results on the screen, but by "fairly good results" remember I mean as compared with possible results—with results which could be produced were the man a careful, painstaking, conscientious operator who thoroughly understood both the practical and technical side of projection.

With this fact in view, and, gentlemen, it absolutely is a fact, it comes with very poor grace to have the operators' organization, which should by all means stand for the best—stand for improvement and perfection of results on the screen, oppose, either actively or passively, the spread of knowledge.

Of course, the basis of this opposition is thoroughly understood by the editor. It lies in the conviction that the work of the writer will tend to create operators, and thus render the improvement of conditions more difficult by over-crowding the market. In my opinion and judgment, and I am 47 years of old age, and have had a wide and active experience in the labor movement, there is little or nothing in this proposition, and there would be absolutely nothing in it if the unions themselves took the opposite view, and encouraged their own members to use the avenues of knowledge which are made available. They have such a long start on the tyro that by no possibility could he overtake them. But, laying that aside, let me close by repeating that, in any event, under existing conditions, opposition to the spread of knowledge simply advertises the operator as being willing to attempt to advance his own interest at the expense of every other division of the moving picture industry, including the audiences.

Defends the Operator.

L. C. LaGrow, Albany, N. Y., writes:

On page 539, January 31st issue, is a letter from some person who is either suffering from sore-head or advance criticism. In either case I wish to defend the operator. In the first place, he admits his weakness in attending the theater he so ironically described. Must have gone back for more. Why? In the second place, he attempts to criticise that of which he knows nothing until informed by you, viz.: Speed. Then he, as does the entire uneducated public, lays the blame at the door of the operator. Now, Mr. Editor, you will have to show me the operator who will voluntarily race a show. To race is to run more reels in a given time, which means more work for the operator. You can bet your last copper that operator had strict orders from the manager to "get 'em out," and if the aforesaid operator did not "chase-'em-through" someone else will. And why? Because that same fellow who took up good space in our department, knocking one of us, and thousands of others like him, fall over themselves to give the "chase-'em-through" manager their good coin. Verily there is one born every minute.

Well, Brother LaGrow, you and I do not agree on this proposition at all. It is quite true, no doubt, that the operator himself was not directly to blame for the speeding of the films. But how about the film jumping from the sprocket, and the shadows on the screen? I am a firm believer in the fact that just such criticism as this, provided that it be given only when deserved, which is when the performance is rank, does a whole lot of good. I do not regard it as knocking anyone, but simply setting forth the facts, and if the facts don't look good, why that is the fault of the theater; in this case probably of both the manager and the operator. I have done a little hammering myself lately, and you may take it from me, friend LaGrow, I am going to do some more, if I find faults in the projection of the theaters I visit. Of course, there is always danger that one who does not understand all the details of the business will do injustice, but, on the other hand, these fellows you speak of are, you must remember, the very ones who are paying in their money and supporting the industry off which you and I live. Don't let that fact escape you, neighbor LaGrow. They are entitled to be heard, and when they pay their good money to see a show, and instead see a bunch of shadows and a jumping travesty of projection, they have a very legitimate kick coming.

Dissolving Stunt.

W. B. McNaughton, Longview, Texas, writes:

Have watched closely for someone to spring the little scheme which we have evolved here in Longview. Here it is, and if you think it will be of use please publish. With two machines connected through one Fort Wayne compensarc, we show our slides as follows: On machine No. 1 show the slide under ordinary conditions, except that the carbons must be kept as close together as possible without freezing them. Then cut in lamp No. 2 holding the carbons close and gradually separating those on machine No. 1. This will hold the light on No. 2 and fade it out on No. 1. After which the process is reversed until the slides are all run. It produces a good dissolving view effect without any extra expense for apparatus. My explanation may not be very clear, but I think any one familiar with the work can dope it out.

As I understand it, it is simply a proposition of the lamps being wired in multiple so that the striking of one arc kills the other, and, while the effect as set forth is well known, I did not know it had as yet been applied to dissolving, though I see no reason why the effect should not be fairly good. Many thanks for the idea, which no doubt will be of value to other operators and managers.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

Comments on the Films

THE CYNIC (Selig), Feb. 24.—This is a somewhat different offering and proves conclusively that a philosopher with his broad mind is much happier than a pessimist or cynic, and that human beings exist that are innately honest when sorely tempted; even when dire need drives. The author is E. Lynn Summers and director, Ralph Delmore. Walter Roberts was the cynic and John O'Hara the philosopher. It is an enjoyable picture without a severe punch.

DOC YAK, THE CARTOONIST (Selig), Feb. 24.—This is on the same reel with "The Cynic," and is "about the same" as usual.

THE MYSTERY OF THE LADDER OF LIGHT (Edison), Feb. 24.—(Fourth Mystery in the Chronicles of Cleek, by Thomas W. Hanshew.) There were several mysteries in this offering. It is a sort of concrete affair and things happen that seem to have no continuity. Cause and effect seems to have been eliminated altogether. How Cleek took it in his head to take a walk and go to just where he was needed the worst, must have been an inspiration, as nothing indicates his purpose in doing so. The actors—a large cast—did the best they could in a poor vehicle. The camera work for the most part was fine. It did not create much excitement.

HEAR NO EVIL (Essanay), Feb. 24.—A very pretty and well-worked out picture which carries with it a moral lesson. Jealousy and vituperation in a busines office force furnish the theme, with a counter plot of love hinged on, of course. It is all interesting and well acted and directed. The clean-cut plot is void of anything objectionable, the action is a little abrupt in some instances, which seems to be a growing fault with directors. However, this is worth sitting through and will be thought of afterward.

THE LOST CHILD (Lubin), Feb. 24.—A very laughable little comedy by Helena Moore, directed by Joseph Smiley. The limit of license is almost reached by the author and director to start this plot going. Nothing short of a "non compos mentis" would do as the boy did in this picture. It is funny in its development and subsequently causes hearty laughter all through. It involves a pair of newlyweds in several embarrassing situations that create a guessing match. It is a well acted and taken offering.

THE RISE OF OFFICER CASEY (Lubin), Feb. 24.—Casey is the "boob" of the police force and the butt of ridicule for his fellow patrolmen. Some people acquire good luck through their efforts, others are born to it, but Casey simply tumbles into his good luck by accident. This picture is funny, even if it is ridiculous and caused hearty laughter. It was consistently acted, considering it borders on slap-stick comedy.

THE WINNING HAND (Pathe), Feb. 24.—This picture offering combines in its plot several interesting complications, contrasting selfishness with self-sacrifice. Tom Brooks is a big-hearted gambler (Francis Carlyle), whose whole heart is wrapped up in his son. He sends him to school to get him out of the atmosphere of his own life and keeps him there until grown up. A consistent story with a love interest running through it lends interest to it. Eleanor Woodruff, Paul Panzer, Jack Standing and Rae Tompkins are the principals and do good work. Well produced in every respect. The finale is satisfactory.

MRS. MANLY'S BABY (Essanay), Feb. 25.—A woman who has been guilty of bigamy is furnished with funds to escape the law by a suffrage organization to which she belongs. Later, she sends her baby to one of these ladies, claiming that she cannot care for it, and the other woman has no children. The victim prepares for the baby. When it arrives she is greatly surprised, for the baby is not of exactly the proportion she had anticipated and prepared for. It is a laughable picture and well produced.

THE HERO (Vitagraph), Feb. 25.—This offering did make some laugh in the audience. There is no accounting for different tastes, but how such a cute little picture of femininity as Nora Talmadge could admire such a creature of avoirdupois as Hughie Mack, presented, in comparison with her brothers's friend is beyond ken. Mr. Mack was very unctuous in his role. James Morrison, George Cooper and William Shea ably assisted in making this an amusing number. The photography is as good as the Vitagraph brand always make.

LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM (Edison), Feb. 25.—This comedy was written and directed by Charles H. France. Its plot involves several amusing scenes, logical and illogical. However, it serves its mission. The henpecked husbands finally revolt and turn the tables, after years of subjection, to a supremacy that relieves them of domestic humiliation and much strenuousness. It caused considerable laughter. The theater scene was above the average. It is worth seeing.

CRAWFISHING (Vitagraph), Feb. 25.—On the same reel is an educational picture that is very interesting.

SEPTEMBER MORN (Pathe), Feb. 25.—This comedy has been created evidently to exploit the caption and arouse curiosity. It is rather farfetched, but original and serves its purpose. Chas. Arling works hard to help along, as does Caroline Rankin and Joseph Burke. The "votes for women" is incorporated in the working out of the plot. It is amusing and will please.

CHEESE MINING (Edison), Feb. 25.—On the same reel with "Love's Young Dream" is this interesting industrial, with above caption, illustrating the method of mining cheese (?). It is intended to be quite comical, but could have been made more amusing if the strenuous efforts to get laughs were modified considerably. The idea is a good one. It is better than some near comedies. Can't say as to the quality of the cheese.

KING BABY'S BIRTHDAY (Selig), Feb. 25.—This photoplay was written by W. E. Wing and M. McGregor was the director. While it smacks of the newlyweds, it is rather original in conception and well done. It is baby's birthday and the parents buying ridiculous presents furnish the comedy, also their extravagant affection for the child is amusing. It is a clean, logical little comedy and worthy of a place on any program. The acting of Thomas Santschi, Harriet Notter, and Lyllian Brown Leighton is very natural.

TESTED BY FIRE (Selig), Feb. 26.—This film makes interesting use of some picturesque forest scenery, the hero being a government ranger. The country girl falls in love with a city stranger, but when the forest bursts into flame he deserts her in a cowardly manner. Some picturesque effects are achieved, and while the story is not powerful it holds the attention well.

WINKY WILLIE'S ARITHMETIC (Melies), Feb. 26.—A delicately amusing half reel, in which the small lad takes his hard problem in arithmetic to the grocer, who accepts it as an order for supplies. The boy's parents are greatly surprised when the groceries are delivered.

BATTY BILLY AND HIS PAL'S LEGACY (Melies), Feb. 26.—This, on same reel with above, has some good eccentric humor in it. Batty Bill's antics in search of the hidden securities are very amusing.

THE ARM OF VENGEANCE (Essanay), Feb. 26.—A Western offering which tells an entertaining story. The little girl becomes lost in the woods and is cared for by the friendly Indian. The Indian, suspected of stealing her, is shot in the arm by one of the cowboys. The close of the picture shows the Indian being cared for by the child's parents. A simple story with a pleasing out-door atmosphere.

THE OLD OAK'S SECRET (Vitagraph), Feb. 26.—This is a well-rounded story of love and war. The opening and closing scenes are taken about an old oak tree on which the lovers have carved their initials. The fighting episodes are merely incidental and the chief interest centers about a missing will. A good number.

REGGIE THE SQUAW MAN (Kalem), Feb. 27.—The idea inculcated in this offering is a good one and deserves better treatment. The direction seems to be the fault. The business given the Indian wife of Reggie is ridiculous and in places disgusting. The actors worked hard, too hard to get it over. Such pictures will never elevate the film business in the estimation of enlightened audiences. The camera work was excellent.

A CHANGE IN BAGGAGE CHECKS (Vitagraph), Feb. 27.—This is a very funny comedy picture play, the plot hinged on a change of baggage checks of two vaudevillians who play the same theaters. What makes it more funny than it would be otherwise is the fact that John Bunny and Flora Finch are playing the leading parts. The picture is well done in every detail. It caused great hilarity.

A DESPERATE CHANCE (Lubin), Feb. 27.—A very plausible and interesting dramatic story concerning a drunken worthless husband, with a sick wife. It is quite emotional in many places, but there are details lacking. There has been a murder and $500 reward is offered for the murderer. The drunken husband redeems himself by proclaiming that he did the deed. It is all rather peculiar, but terminates satisfactorily. The cast—Justina Huff, John Smiley, Billy Carr, Jas. Daly and Alex. Miller—did finely. A worthy number in every way.

THE ATTIC ABOVE (Selig), Feb. 27.—This story concerns the working out of a plan of revenge on a banker who's cashier has been sent to prison for a term of years for forgery. On his release he immediately gets his plans under way. Several very fine scenes are shown, but the lighting for the most part is not up to the standard. The principals are Henry Otto, Harold Lockwood, H. B. Carpenter, Mrs. A. D. Blake and little Utanah La Reno. It interests.

CHOCOLATE DYNAMITE (Biograph), Feb. 28.—A pictureplay comedy with moments that border on the tragic. It is rural in atmosphere and full of ginger. It elucidates the quick wit of a girl under trying circumstances. She causes the arrest of two tramp burglars by a strategic movement worthy of a general; the denouement causes spontaneous laughter. The girl deserves mention for good work.

BECAUSE OF A HAT (Biograph), Feb. 28.—On the same reel with "Chocolate Dynamite" is one of the best comedies the Biograph ever released. It is a rapid burlesque, but clean cut. It deservedly got more hearty laughs from the audience than the majority of comedies usually receive. The fight scene is immense, especially in the ring. If this offering doesn't make you laugh, you have forgotten how. Exhibitors treat your patrons to a good one.

THE GHOST OF MOTHER EVE (Edison), Feb. 28.—This is the second of the "Dolly of the Dailies" series, by Acton Davies. It is not conventional, but full of improbabilities that crop up plentifully. Dolly gets a job writing a fashion column for a society lady who gets the credit; Dolly gets seven dollars per. This innovation serves to show off fashionable gowns on beautiful living models. Dolly throws up her job. Mary Fuller as Dolly is adequate. This will please the ladies.

BRONCHO BILLY'S BIBLE (Essanay), Feb. 28.—This pictureplay is really one of, if not the best, production of the series. In holding up a stage coach with a companion, he finds a bible. What the good book does for Billy is very interesting and surprising, both physically and mentally. It is a fine feature and will satisfy all. This picture is a re-issue.

COON TOWN SUFFRAGETTES (Lubin), Feb. 28.—This is a good inspiration and well produced. It is also well acted, considering that the cast is made up of genuine colored people, with John and Mattie Edwards as principals. It is a very comic offering with a good finish. The revolt in coon town of the wives against their husbands and police gives a good finale.

FATHER'S TEMPER (Lubin), Feb. 28.—On the same reel as "Coon Town Suffragettes." "Gee, but father has a mean disposition"; so mean it hurts him and everybody else. The acting is exaggerated somewhat, but is laughable. He is cured of his temper, by his prospective son-in-law, however. It caused considerable laughter.

THE DELAYED SPECIAL (Kalem), Feb. 28.—This is a very able offering and is well acted and directed. It has some intense and emotional scenes, also several punches (real ones on the reel). It illustrates fully the different natures of men—the sordidness of some and the nobleness of others. The fight in the telegraph office is well done. The railroad scenes are wonderfully clever and clear. The gentleman playing the lead, and the little boy who is injured deserve special mention. It is all first-class and genuinely realistic and natural.

A BUNCH OF FLOWERS (Biograph), March 2.—Gives us the life story of a husband who is a good "provider," as shown, but very selfish. His wife leaves him until he learns that a woman's love is of more value than success. It is rather crudely done, for the selfishness is "rubbed in," and this makes it seem more like a tract than a story. There are many lovely pictures among the scenes and the offering will please the many.

BUFFALO JIM (Vitagraph), March 2.—A Western picture with little that is new or deeply convincing. Its central character is a frivolous woman who is discredited. We dare not call it better than fair.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 18, March 2.—Interesting and very truly worth while. There is room for improvement in photography.

Licensed Special

DOCTOR POLLY (Vitagraph), Feb. 24.—A story of shattered nerves relieved in a peculiar and original manner. It is a two-reel picture and the various scenes are beautiful and well lighted. Miss Lillian Walker and Wallie Van are the leading characters and well supported by others in the cast. It is a clean, wholesome offering and, like Oliver Twist, makes one wish for more. Anyone afflicted with nervous prostration take a look at this demonstration of a new cure; it is guaranteed. Exhibitors will do well to book it.

THE MONEY SHARKS (Cines), Feb. 24.—This three-reel production is, as far as scenic environments and photographic excellence are concerned, a high-class photoplay. The acting is up to the standard also. The plot is conventional and fails to convince in several scenes, but the superior direction eliminates many faults and makes the spectator forget discrepancies. It is padded generously through the three reels and the same story could have been elucidated on half the film. It involves love, greed, dishonesty, and several inconsistencies, if one stops to think. The redeeming feature is the fact that the "Money Shark" came to grief in the finale. It is gripping and will interest the average audience.

SEALED ORDERS (Lubin), Feb. 25.—This two-reel production is not only interesting, but pretentious. The author is Will M. Ritchey and it was directed by Wilbert Melville. The plot develops the workings of the secret service of Mexico in connection with that of the United States and illustrates what extremes will be resorted to and risk run by the participants to fulfill their commissions. Miss Velma Whitman and L. C. Shumway were in the leads, and well supported. This is a well-produced offering and will please.

THE TIGERS OF THE HILLS (Kalem), Feb. 25.—This picture play depicts the method the Indians follow in disposing of their dead and the plot involves the desecration of one of their cemeteries by ignorant emigrants who are driving over the plains to the West. By this unintentional act they incur the vengeance of the Indians. A love story is woven in; a romance of an army post. It is all very interesting and void of suggestiveness. The "Hero," branded as a coward, wins out. The battle in the stockade is lacking in detail and action somewhat. The acting is fairly done.

THE MASSACRE (Biograph), Feb. 26.—A two-reel offering which reproduces on an elaborate scale actual scenes from the government war with the Indians of the Northwest. The story interest is conventional, but well sustained. It is in the tremendous fighting and scenic effects that this production excels. The photography is excellent and the story as it progresses seems to carry the observer into the heart of the early West. Bears and coyotes are pictured at the scene of the massacre and some interesting types, such as the preacher and the gambler, are portrayed. A fine release.

THE DEVIL'S ASSISTANT (Pathe), Feb. 26.—This two-reel number presents a strong study of the hereditary influence of drink. The daughter of a drunkard is induced by an artist to become his model. The girl playing this part is possessed of a wonderfully strong and expressive face. She rises from her squalid surroundings under the spur of her new work, but in the end the artist selfishly casts her back into the life from which she has come. The scene in which the girl destroys his painting was well put on. An artistic production.

THE TWO ROSES (Lubin), Feb. 26.—A well-sustained story of a young married man who is lured from his cold, undemonstrative wife by a designing woman. The pictures are particularly good and the acting quiet and effective. The heartless woman is fatally injured in an auto accident and her last wish is that the husband return to his wife. Edward J. Piel, Ormi Hawley and Ada Charles are in the cast. The boy's part was also nicely played. A strong offering of its type.

THE DRAMA IN HEYVILLE (Edison), Feb. 27.—Mr. Ashley Miller, who wrote and produced the above two-reel comedy, certainly did himself proud, for it is a happy, original thought, and runs the gamut from the sublime to the ridiculous. Hod Mullins, actor and manager of the Demosthenes Dramatic Club of Heyville, pirates and reproduces the "Union Spy," a drama he has attended in the city, with the assistance of the members of his club. In the first part is shown the city production by a strong professional cast. Hod takes copious notes from a lower box. The second part he is shown casting, rehearsing and producing the play in the town hall. He has to contend with the usual bickerings, jealousies, etc., but wins out. The scenery, costumes and properties are almost as good as the show. The cast is made up of the best Edison people. It is difficult to visualize any spectator who fails to laugh at and enjoy this picture.

LET NO MAN ESCAPE (Essanay), Feb. 27.—This is a very well constructed two-reel pictureplay and contains several strong, dramatic situations that hold interest. It seemed a little long drawn out, in some places. A murder has been committed and the real culprit, Gordon Thorne (John H. Cossar), accuses John Brannon (Richard C. Travers) of being guilty. Circumstances are such that Brannon believes himself guilty and he flees to the West, taking his little daughter. The plot runs through years, but is easy to follow. Brannon's daughter is finely done by Baby Madden, 4 years; Eleanor Kahn, 7 years; Ruth Stonehouse, 18 years. William Bailey, as Gunther, a detective, caught the real murderer after a fourteen-year chase. A good offering, with Mr. Bailey showing to great advantage.

THE DRUDGE (Vitagraph), Feb. 28.—An emotional drama which contains several dramatic scenes, some of which are intense. The plot is not of a very pleasant nature and carries with it a flavor of improbabilities. A young girl school teacher, a young indigent lover, her fiance, and a rich, rascally ranch owner, also owner of an unruly young son, are the principals. The lover leaves to make his fortune and the ranchman intercepts her letters from her lover and prevails on her to marry him—hence, in time she is his drudge. The ending is depressing, however, it is a good picture, and well acted.

THE TRAGEDY OF AMBITION (Selig), March 2.—A two-part feature giving a sentimental melodrama with a love story between the son of socially prominent people and the cashier of a cheap eating house of not very savory reputation. Bessie Eyton carries her role (the heroine) with grace and humanity, if not power; but Wheeler Oakman, in the opposite role, is decidedly unconvincing—the truth is he made some laugh by his playing the last act, which shows him on his sick bed. We dare not call it a strong release: the story is weak, although the picture has many very pretty scenes that are beautifully photographed. Lanier Bartlett is the author and the script was produced by Colin Campbell.

THE CHEST OF FORTUNE (Kalem), March 2.—A two-reel story of the South in war time and later. It is fresh and, with the exception of the over-drawn melodrama at the end of the second reel, is reasonable and human. We can call it a good production, for many of its scenes—those showing war and peaceful occupations—are well handled and full of good atmosphere. But the audience was critical this morning and laughed at its series of casualties from the bullets of Morgan's men who want the treasure chest which is thrown overboard and saved to identify the hero later, when grown up. These deaths do become a bit amusing, for they are many and not convincing. The photography is good and there's good entertainment in the picture.

Independent

THE HOLD-UP (Princess), Feb. 27.—This picture has a plot a bit too old to amount to much as entertainment, although it is true that to many spectators even this trite story will be interesting. In order to cure a too romantic miss, her parents conspire with a man who loves her and let her elope with her music teacher, whom they know is a bigamist and forger, and then hold up the two, bring them both home and show the girl the forger's picture as a wan "wanted" by the police. The setting and photography are of high quality, but the acting is not strong.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL NO. 7 (Reliance), Mar. 2.—The girl has gone tango "nutty" and it gives a very welcome touch of humor to this installment of the series. The story doesn't progress much. We get a chance to see how the newest dance steps are taught, including the "hesitation," "Cortez," "hitch," "scissors," "media luna," and others. It has a very fair entertainment value. The photography is first-class and it has some pretty scenes.

THE STRONGER HAND (Majestic), Mar. 3.—There is little of the taste of true life in this story and, though, of course, it is only a tale, the ethics of its characters is not exactly normal. It is also too unconvincing to be effective as a tale. Yet it is full of incidents and in particular there is a novel and well-handled mob scene, although the meaning of the mob is not clear enough to give a punch to the situation. The photography is clear.

THE OPAL RING (Imp), Mar. 5.—This two reel subject is based on the popular superstition of the opal. It is good melodrama. Frank Crane is the producer. The leads are played by Alexander Gaden and Ethel Grandin. The story is well directed and care has been given to the settings.

PRETZEL CAPTURES THE SMUGGLERS (Frontier), Mar. 5.—This is a burlesque. It may make the simple laugh, but surely it will cause grief among the judicious.

THE IMPOSTOR (Komic), Mar. 5.—There is no real strength in what this picture shows; it isn't unbiased or fair to life. But it is ably acted throughout and well presented and, although it decides nothing, it does suggest thought, so we dare commend it as an acceptable offering. With many it will pass as a strong indictment of hypocrisy; for it contrasts the subtle Thanksgiving of a wealthy rector with the simple deceit of a street "blind man." There has been some attempt to make a pathetic story and it is fairly successful.

WHEN FATE FROWNED (Reliance), Mar. 7.—A tragic story of untamed passion set in a rough mountainous country and of dramatic quality that will surely hold attention. The acting and staging make the situations effective. It is Western stuff, but has the sense of life that passes for convincing truth while it is being looked at. Miriam Cooper and R. M. Welsh play the leading roles well. The camera work is very fair.

THE MYSTERY OF BUFFALO GAP (Frontier), Mar. 7.—Western melodrama. The story is of a mysterious bandit, which later proves to be none other than the sheriff himself. There is considerable action, but there is an absence of holding quality.

SOME BOY (Joker), Mar. 7.—This reel, written by Gus Inglis, pictures the antics of a bad boy. He interferes with the love affairs of the grocer and policeman and later creates trouble at a party. This is a rough type of humor, but will appeal to some observers.

A MODERN FAIRY TALE (Rex), Mar. 8.—A pretty little story written by Lois Weber, with Ella Hall and Phillips Smalley in the leads. The princess, in love with a supposed country swain, rebels when her grandfather insists upon her marriage to Lord Burleigh. The observers share her delight when it is discovered that they are one and the same. A good romance, well photographed.

BIRDS OF PASSAGE (Eclair), Mar. 8.—This is a clever and artistic comedy of the lightest type. It deals with the experiences of a young artist and musician who cannot pay the rent. The tinted pictures are very appealing and the story well presented.

ORCHIDS (Eclair), Mar. 8.—Some extremely attractive views of orchids, showing them in the process of blooming. This, with the above half reel, makes a desirable release.

LIZZIE AND THE ICE MAN (Crystal), Mar. 8.—A knockabout domestic comedy, in which Pearl White appears as a hired girl with athletic tendencies. The ice man carries a man upstairs with his tongs, which furnishes some amusement. When the plot thins out the hired girl brings her rolling pin into play and damages the heads of her numerous admirers.

HEARTS AND FLOWERS (Victor), Mar. 9.—J. Warren Kerrigan and Cleo Madison are featured in this. The girl boasts to her friends that she can induce the gardener to kiss her, and succeeds in this, but her own lover rejects her as a result. A highly improbable plot, and uncertain in its development, but well acted and by no means uninteresting. The title should have given some clue to the plot.

BIMBERG'S LOVE AFFAIR (Crystal), Mar. 10.—This concerns the matrimonial entanglements of an uncle, an aunt, a nephew and a niece. The characters are quite pleasing, but the story is of a very familiar style.

BALDY BELMONT BREAKS OUT (Crystal), Mar. 10.—This, on same reel with above, pictures Belmont as an escaped convict. He poses as a scarecrow and has other adventures. Fairly amusing.

UNIVERSAL IKE'S MOVING (Universal Ike), Mar. 10.—For persons who enjoy a travesty on anything as solemn as a funeral, this film will afford plenty of amusement. Augustus Carney, in the part of Ike, pretends he is dead. He comes to life after the last sad rites and pushes his wife and her new admirer into the grave, covering them with earth.

THE MEXICO MIX (Joker), Mar. 11.—This half-reel, written by Capt. L. T. Peacock, is a burlesque on the Mexican revolution. The subtitles and many of the situations are very funny and are sure to bring laughter. The war ends with everybody dancing the tango.

JEALOUSY AND GIANT POWDER (Imp), Mar. 12.—The extravagant wife is being measured by a man tailor and her husband plants a can of giant powder outside her door, with a lighted fuse. The following scenes are of a burlesque type and furnish a fair amount of amusement of the slapstick sort.

THE COLONEL OF THE NUTTS (Frontier), Mar. 12.—This offering depicts in eccentric manner the efforts of a certain man to get patients for an insane asylum. There is no definite plot and the humor does not get hold very strongly. Some of the scenes were well photographed.

WHAT A BABY DID (Nestor), Mar. 13.—This puts some fresh touches on the familiar story of the young man with a strange baby on his hands. The dash through the department store, and substitution of the negro baby, was very amusing. This cast, consisting of Eddie Lyons, Victoria Ford, Lee Moran, Stella Adams and Russell Basset, is unusually pleasing in light comedy offerings.

THE FAITH OF TWO (Powers), Mar. 13.—The opening scenes in this number, featuring Edwin August and Ethel Davis, were very attractive, but a little too jerky to get up proper feeling. The separation of the young violinist from his wife and their subsequent bringing together makes quite a pleasing story; in the meantime Terio has won the artistic success he craved. Good photography helps the film story.

HIS YOUNGER BROTHER (Frontier), Mar. 14.—Three love affairs become entangled in this picture, the scenes being taken on a Western ranch. The relationship of the characters was not made very clear at the start, but toward the close the film gets hold of the interest very nicely.

A STORY OF LITTLE ITALY (American), Mar. 14.—Lack of reasonable construction in the plot of this story keeps it from being effective as a whole; but the business of its scenes keeps it awake and the players help it by their acting. Tony is so simple an Italian that he gets continually in hot water; but finds a woman to look out for him and, after little Tony comes, luck changes. No one will believe that any human being had these experiences just as here given. The photography is excellent and the offering will get by.

AT THE COURT OF PRINCE MAKE-BELIEVE (Eclair), Mar. 15.—A children's story in which a small boy has a fantastic dream. The film leaves the observer somewhat uncertain in the beginning as to just what is intended and the sub-titles were too oldish in tone to fit the story, but later the plot becomes more interesting. The child actors were pleasing.

KELLY'S GHOST (Crystal), Mar. 15.—This reel opens with a spiritualistic seance in a boarding house and winds up with a travesty on a funeral. Kelly becomes intoxicated and is supposed to be dead. He is placed in a coffin full of cracked ice. Later he recovers and causes much excitement. This is distinctly low comedy, but will have numerous amusing moments for those who enjoy this sort of fun.

Independent Specials

THE GOLDEN CROSS (Thanhouser), Feb. 24.—This two-reel picture features Maud Fealey and has evidently been written for her to display her talents. It is a romantic vehicle and serves the purpose for which it was intended. She is very pleasing in the part and has good support. The story is a complicated one and a little dense in places. The settings are fine, especially the exteriors. With Maud Fealey as the star in a picture it could not be anything else but a success. If exhibitors book this reel they will surely please their patrons.

THE PROFESSOR'S AWAKENING (Beauty), Feb. 25.—A farcical love story without much plot and though not all of it is amusing, it can't be said to drag. The professor, who is not convincingly absent-minded, but acts queerly, is played by Harry Pollard and the fisher girl, with whom he falls in love, by Margarita Fisher. There are some fine views of sea and shore. The titles are in a queer purple color not wholly pleasing. A fair offering.

THE YAQUI'S REVENGE (Bison 101), Mar. 7.—There is much action in these two reels—that is, rushing around and keeping things moving. There is much of the melodrama, if frequent use of pistols and knives constitute such. There is an absence of suspense, if we except the train fight, which did furnish a few tense moments.

CALL OF THE TRAUMEREI (American), Mar. 9.—For extended review of this three-reel offering see page 1214 of March 7, 1914.

THE FLAMING DIAGRAM (Imp), Mar. 9.—The manner in which the key to the formula is figured out by the inventor's son makes an original and pleasing feature of this offering. It leaves the observer well pleased with the double reel, although the fore part of the story is rather conventional in plot. This is a drama of international intrigue, the interest centering about the possession of the valuable formula. The action is good, but there is not much suspense till toward the last. King Baggott, Leah Baird and Frank Smith are in the cast.

THE HONEYMOONERS (Victor), Mar. 13.—A two-reel subject with Florence Lawrence and Matt Moore in the cast. This follows the fortunes of two young married couples, whose tastes diverge on the subject of cards and music. Deciding they have been mismated, they all go to Reno, but in the end their matrimonial troubles are readjusted. The plot is rather slight and the settings lack variety, but at the same time the story moves along easily and becomes quite diverting toward the close.

A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE (Ammex).—In three reels, a feature with enough to its credit to insure a following, although the story is somewhat more "brassy" in what it makes human beings do than the average story. There are many lovely scenes due to staging and photography which are both creditable. The heroine is all that could be desired; but the quality on which the offering really stands is its sense of romance. The story is clear; the setting is Western and there is a little typical "Western stuff," horses, etc., just for their own sake, in it. A fair offering.

THE GAMBLER'S PENALTY (Great Northern).—A strongly acted three-part picture that has been staged in the best style of the Great Northern studio which is high praise for it. It makes a very safe offering for all kinds of audiences. The story is sensational and clear once it gets under way. In the scenes there is grace, charm and dignity derived from the prettiness of its sets and its lovely photography and from the conduct of the players in the roles. The art quality of its photographs is marked; so much so that spectators of discrimination will find unqualified delight in many of them. It is strange how the wonder and marvel of truly life-like camera work never leaves us; before perfect photography, we will always be astonished.

WINNING HIS FIRST CASE (Photodrama).—A four-reel melodrama in which a young lawyer wins a girl by saving her innocent brother from the electric chair. It is overdrawn melodrama, not at all artistic; but, although it would have been the better for condensation, it has action—the story keeps going. There's a freshly conceived "third degree" episode in which a confession is wrung from the innocent youth by the police. There are also other good things as a realistic (actual) fire scene and a fine trial picture. The acting is acceptable except in those scenes in the house of the real murderer, in which two players' rather lame work marred somewhat. The camera work is fair.

LILLIAN WALKER'S COME-BACK.

After an absence of two weeks, Lillian Walker, the Vitagraph player and general favorite, returned to the studios to again enter the pictures in which she is to portray the lead. Miss Walker has been very much under the weather of late. While her health has not been in any way impaired, she has been very much exhausted and her brief vacation was very much appreciated by her, although she regretted it did not last longer. She wishes to convey to her many friends her gratitude for their expressions of interest in her work and in her; also says that she will reply to their letters as soon as time and opportunity presents itself.

NOVELTY DANCE.

The employees of the American Film Manufacturing Company will hold their first novelty dancing party at Colonial Ballroom, 20 W. Randolph Street, Chicago, St. Patrick's night, Tuesday, March 17, 1914. Program at nine. Novelties of all description will be rendered throughout the evening.

The Camera in the Arctics

Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt Has Demonstrated What Can Be Done in Scientific Exploration With the Aid of a Camera—His Latest Pictures Show Marvelous Progress.

By W. Stephen Bush.

WHATEVER work the kinematograph has done to aid scientific explorations in the past it is as nothing compared to its certain achievements in the future. As an inkling of the great improvement which may be expected of the motion picture portrayal of nature in our own country, the new Kleinschmidt pictures may be cited with every confidence. Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt, in his first attempt at kinematographic work in Alaska, took some remarkable pictures despite the fact that he was then a comparative novice and that his difficulties were extraordinary. With the experience which he gathered in 1912, he went back to Alaska, not only with a full realization of the possibilities for his work, but better equipped in every conceivable way and with dearly-bought experience as a new and most valuable asset. It is not intended in these lines to describe in detail his most recent work with the camera in Alaska. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has given some account of that, but no appreciation of the captain's work would be complete without giving the readers of the paper some idea of the man behind the enterprise. Captain Kleinschmidt, like most men who achieve things, is reluctant to step into the limelight and be gazed upon by the multitude, but he is willing at all times to speak of the "pleasure" (as he calls it) of his toil in the arctic regions.

Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt.

The idea that Alaska is a sort of refrigerator in which nature stores things, and is, on the whole, inhospitable, has been dispelled by the captain's work.

"I want to assure the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD," he said, "that this wonderful new world is only just beginning to be discovered. Nature has indeed locked her gold in some of the most forbidding parts of the great territory and this has spread abroad the impression that Alaska is mainly composed of ice and a few grains of gold and an odd herd or two of reindeer, with possibly a polar bear or walrus to vary the program. As a matter of fact, the Alaskan flora has a sweet and fragrant beauty of its own. During part of the year we have sunlight twenty-four hours in the day, and the spring and summer in Alaska have charms and beauties which can never be forgotten by those who have enjoyed them, and which draw men and women back to that country. I have learned much in the way of camera work. I think I have proved in my pictures that Alaska is the greatest natural game preserve of the world and may be rivaled, but not surpassed, by Africa. The animal life in the arctic regions has an interest of its own quite peculiar and always fascinating. The task which I set myself was not merely to portray specimens of animals, but to show them as they live and breathe in nature.

When I first took up this work I sought the coöperation of many prominent producers of films, but I could not make much headway. I was told that any zoological garden would supply all that was wanted of arctic animal lore. The fallacy of this has now been amply proved, not only by my own, but other animal pictures as well. It is one thing to take pictures of a caged animal and another thing to take a picture of the same animal in its wild state. It is impossible to get a true notion of the habits, character and peculiarities of animals by watching the captive specimen. About the only thing the caged animal does is to pace the floor of its prison, to feed and to sleep. What a different picture is offered by nature! The animal in its freedom out in the wilds shows the grace and strength and cunning and love of life which it never displays in the cage, circus or the zoological garden. Take, for instance, the bull moose in nature. The animal believes it is unobserved; with a free, natural, graceful stride it stalks through the forest, now coming to a halt to drink, perhaps, or to peer cautiously through the twigs and branches to see if all is safe. To watch such an animal step slowly and majestically from the edge of the woods into the open gives one an indescribable thrill."

Growing enthusiastic in talking of his many reminiscences, the captain exclaimed:

"How much more I prefer hunting with the camera to hunting with the rifle. After all, what sportsmanship is there in a man equipped with a modern high-powered rifle to shoot down an animal at a safe distance which has done him no harm. What useful object does it serve, unless, of course, we except those who kill for food? How much more instructive and interesting to catch the characteristic pose of the creature on the film and show it, and delight thousands and hundreds of thousands of men, women and children. Hunting with the camera is far more difficult than hunting with the rifle. To do effective camera work, you have to get within mighty close range of the animals, and stalking becomes a science indeed. I have often cheerfully endured cold and all kinds of privations and hardships for the sake of a few feet of interesting film, and I have always felt most amply repaid by the delight and pleasure I have been able to bring to others with such films.

"Another thing worth while learning about Alaska is the change in its trade and commercial conditions, and these, too, I have portrayed whenever they held any matter of human interest."

"The Stag at Eve Had Drunk His Fill."

The captain refuses to admit that he ever was in "imminent deadly peril." He returns the admiration of the city dweller by wondering how he manages to avoid the combined dangers of the third rail, the subway and the taxis.

As soon as he has disposed of his film in this country, the captain will go on a well-earned holiday with his wife and children. He is keen to see the old homestead in Germany, which he has not seen since he left it in early boyhood. He wants to travel all through Europe, touching, at his leisure, all the beautiful and historic spots. He may be gone for a year, but he knows where to go when he gets back here. Alaska is his home. It was there he met his wife—his children were born in Alaska, and in Alaska he achieved his successes in life. He is still a young man and an intense lover of nature. Educational and scientific kinematography, of which he has been an enthusiastic and self-sacrificing pioneer, will occupy much of his time in the days to come.

EXPOSITION COMMITTEE ACTIVE.

The committees of the exposition of motion picture art announced to be held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, June 8 to 13, 1914, appear to be quite active in the work of promotion. They report that they have a number of contracts for space signed and that the success of the undertaking is settled. A printed floor plan has been received which is the same as that laid out for the exposition of last year. The management is in practically the same hands as last year. Frank E. Samuels is manager, with offices at the Grand Central Palace. J. A. Koerpel is chairman of the hotel and transportation committee, and A. A. Corn is chairman of arrangements and entertainment committee.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

The Humane Efforts of a Colorado Prison Warden Bear Fruit.

SEVERAL issues ago, a section of my letter referred to the use of moving pictures by Warden Thomas J. Tynan, of the Colorado Penitentiary, at Canon City, to benefit the convicts in his charge. Now his system of improving and building public highways by honor convicts, so successfully employed by him for the last year, is being reproduced in moving pictures, and in the near future scenes depicting prison road camps and road building will be flashed on screens throughout the country.

A short time ago Edward A. Morrell, of San Francisco, a representative of the California Anti-Capital Punishment League, accompanied by Victor L. Duhem, a moving picture camera man, and Miss M. Ewing, a student of sociology in the University of California, at Berkeley, were the guests of Warden Tynan, for the purpose of studying his methods of reforming convicts in working the honor men on public roads.

Extensive moving pictures of the Colorado convicts at work and their camp life were taken by Duhem, and these will be produced on the Pacific coast immediately, with the idea of creating sentiment in favor of Warden Tynan's humane methods.

Mr. Morrell, who was himself at one time an officer in the California state prison at San Quentin, is making a study of the prisons in five Western states where the honor system is in operation. He already has visited Salem, Ore.; Walla Walla, Wash., and Florence, Ariz. After he leaves Canon City he will inspect the Utah state prison.

Although he has at one time or another visited all the larger penal institutions of the United States, he says the system of prison management in Colorado and Arizona is the most advanced and humanitarian in the country, and gives the best results in reforming prisoners.

According to Mr. Morrell, California has the largest percentage of convicts behind prison walls of any state in the Union, or any civilized country in the world, in proportion to its population.

The Native Sons and Daughters of the land of sunshine, fruit and flowers should join hands in spirited action to remove this stigma from the fair name of their beloved state.

Kathlyn Vogue Becomes a Craze.

Here, in Chicago, the Kathlyn vogue has fairly become a craze. The Kathlyn waltz came out last week and is making a big hit everywhere. It is played by nearly every musical organization that caters to the public, and many requests are made for its playing.

The Kathlyn cocktail has also made its appearance. It is a seductive decoction, of delicious boquet and appetizing excellence. The ladies are strong for it and the men are willing.

The Kathlyn post card is another of the popular fads nowadays. I have been told, on reliable authority, that the largest single order ever given for the same post card was awarded about two weeks ago to a big firm for the Kathlyn type. The order was for one million! Last week 50,000 were sold in one theater, in Chicago, alone, and the country is following suit.

But the foregoing do not include all of the Kathlyn novelties. Not much! Exclusive rights have been secured by several prominent New York and Chicago manufacturers for the making of Kathlyn gowns, Kathlyn hats and Kathlyn beads, all of which styles will be offered during the spring and summer seasons.

What next? Maybe Wm. N. Selig can enlighten us. But he also seems puzzled by developments.

Priest Praises the Photodrama, "Joan of Arc."

The management of the United States Theater, in Denver, during a recent presentation of "Joan of Arc," invited the Rev. Hugh McMendmin, of the Cathedral of Immaculate Conception, to view the films preparatory to showing them to special audiences of children. The reverend gentleman commended the subject and its production in the following words:

"This production of 'Joan of Arc' is beautiful, inspiring and wonderful. The photoplay will help make the whole world love the Maid of Orleans in somewhat the same reverence that France holds for her, and this love of the people of France for Joan should prove a powerful factor in their salvation. To one who brings with him some knowledge of the history of Joan of Arc, the production is a revelation.

"Constituted Authority" Claims Immunity.

On Saturday, Feb. 28, a Mr. Withers, theatrical producer and author of a vaudeville act, entitled "Police—A Dramatic Sketch," secured a temporary injunction from Master-in-Chancery Turnock, restraining the city of Chicago, Chief of Police Gleason, and M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, from preventing the production of the act. Hearing on whether this will be made permanent will take place in a few days.

Withers' petition declared that the play has nothing objectionable in it, but that it portrays the methods used by some police officers in various parts of this country and Europe to obtain confessions from suspects.

It was urged that the meaning of the Latin word "censor" relates to the regulation of morals and conduct and declares that, since there is nothing in any way immoral in the play in question, it should not be censored.

"The police of this city, or of any other city, should not be immune from being shown up before the public, if practices obtain among some of them that are either uncalled for, brutal or illegal," is one of the contentions of the petition for an injunction.

The police of Chicago are intrusted with the censorship of public amusement. Is it not clear that in this case, as in many others in which moving pictures are concerned, they claim an immunity for "constituted authority" contrary to law and plain, common sense justice?

Master-in-Chancery Turnock, at the hearing, gave the following opinion: "We are not living in Russia. There is nothing immoral or indecent in this play. Neither the mayor nor the police have the right to censor this play nor to prevent its presentation because brutality is depicted in the scenes. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' is founded on brutality, and is powerful because of the brutality in it. It tore a nation asunder, yet the police have never prevented its presentation, nor have they the right to stop it."

Beautiful New Theaters in Seattle and Vancouver, B. C.

J. M. McLaughlin, manager of the northwest for A. H. Andrews & Co., this city, with headquarters at Seattle, has been here since Feb. 17, familiarizing himself with the latest styles in opera chairs handled by his company. He has been stationed in Seattle since April 15 last year, and during that time he has increased largely the firm's business in that section, having secured contracts from the majority of the finer modern houses, with seating capacities of 700 to 2,000.

He states that three fine moving picture theaters are now under construction in Seattle, viz: the Liberty, with a capacity of 2,000, to be opened about August 1; the Mission, seating 900, to be finished near the end of April, and the Alaskan, seating 1,200, to be opened about July 1. Mr. McLaughlin has already secured the order for chairs from the Mission, but the Liberty order has not yet been let. The Andrews Company's beautiful chair, the Marlborough, has been contracted for by the Mission management. The Rex Theater, Vancouver, a new house, with a main floor accommodating 1,000 people, has also installed the Andrews Company's chairs. "This is a very beautiful house," says Mr. McLaughlin. "Indeed, it has the most beautiful interior I have ever seen." Mr. McLaughlin will leave for the coast March 5.

Private Presentations in Washington of Buffalo Bill Pictures.

V. R. Day, manager of the city office of the Essanay Co., was in Washington, the week of Feb. 23rd, where he arranged for two private presentations of the Buffalo Bill series of pictures (taken last fall), at the Columbia Theater, that city, on Friday, Feb. 27. Handsomely engraved invitation cards, signed by Col. W. F. Cody, of the Historical Pictures Co., were mailed to a wide circle of government officials and senators and members of the House of Representatives.

Two presentations were given; one in the afternoon and one in the evening, and the handsome little theater was taxed to its seating capacity on both occasions. The pictures were viewed with wrapt interest, and much applause was given during each presentation.

Among those present were: Secretary of the Interior Lane and Mrs. Lane, Secretary of Labor Wilson, former Secretary of the Interior Walter L. Fisher, of Chicago; Assistant Secretary of the Interior Jones and Mrs. Jones, Senator and Mrs. Francis E. Warren, of Wyoming; Senator and Mrs. Benjamin R. Tillman, Senator and Mrs. John F. Shafroth, of Colorado; Representative and Mrs. Wm. R. Smith, of Texas; Representative and Mrs. James A. Frear, of Winconsin; Representative and Mrs. Addison T. Smith, of Idaho; Representative and Mrs. Philip P. Campbell, of Kansas; Representative Murray, of Oklahoma; Nicholas J. Finnett, Oregon; Representative and Mrs. Clarence Miller, of Minnesota, Representative Wm. Kent, of California; Representative and Mrs. James M. Graham, of Illinois; Representative and Mrs. John H. Stevens, of Texas; Representative and Mrs. John E. Raeker, of California; Commissioner of Indian Affairs Cato Sells and Mrs. Sells; George Otis Smith, director of Geological Surveys; Thomas Ewing, Commissioner of Patents; J. A. Holmes, director of the Bureau of Mines; Dr. Van Barveneld, director of the Mining and Metallurgical Exhibit in the Panama-Pacific Exposition; Secretary of War Garrison, and Mrs. Eugene Carr, wife of General Carr, who participated in the Summit Springs battle.

Chicago Film Brevities.

On Wednesday, March 4, the Chicago offices of the Moving Picture World were removed to 917-919 Schiller Building. We cordially invite our numerous friends to call and see us in our new quarters.

Among the films barred by the Chicago censor board last week were: Alphonse Daudet's "Sapho," "The Second Generation," "When Dooley Passed Away," and "The Governor's Ghost." "The Scarlet Letter," at first slated for rejection, was finally given a permit when it was agreed by the owners to confine its presentation to Loop theaters, at an advanced admission price.

The Virginia Theater, 809 West Madison Street, was damaged to the extent of $2,000 by vandals, on Friday night, Feb. 27. The seats were smashed, the machine rendered useless, and the screen cut into shreds. Police Captain Meagher and the manager charge members of the Electrical Workers' union, with which the house had been in trouble, with the vandalism.

Firemen battling a blaze which destroyed the old Humboldt Theater, at West Ohio Street and Milwaukee Avenue, on Feb. 27, narrowly escaped being overcome by gas. The structure was a West Side landmark. It was closed for repairs several months ago and was about to be remodeled. The loss was $5,000.

A prediction that every public school in the United States would have a moving picture machine of its own within the next five years, because of the great educational value of moving pictures, was made one night last week by Second Deputy M. L. C. Funkhouser, in an address before members of the North End Neighborhood Club, which met in the Lincoln Wood School, Evanston. The second deputy also told why he was waging a fight against certain moving picture plays. He also gave a suggestion to the members of the club as to how they could "boss" the aldermen of their ward and not allow the city officials to rule them.

The Chicago censor board rejected the film "How Mocha Came Back," last week because the members objected to the portrayal of Jewish character in it. This was done although an Irishman got the worst of a spat, in which he got mixed up with a Jew.

M. C. Cohen, representing the Apex Film Co. and the Cosmos Film Co., New York, called at the World office Wednesday, Feb. 25th. Mr. Cohen stated that he had sold the rights for Wisconsin and Illinois to the "Famous Battles of Napoleon" (Cosmos), and the same rights to "The Great Dock Disaster" (Apex), to the G. & G. Feature Film Co. He has also sold the rights for Iowa and Nebraska to "The Black Thirteen" (Apex), to Sam Benjamin.

The Chicago Examiner, of Sunday, March 1, devoted a whole page to moving pictures; so did the Tribune. The page in the latter was in colors, with a magnificent cut, and accompanying biographical sketch, of Miss Kathlyn Williams. There was also an interview with Geo. Kleine and other live matter pertaining to the film and screen. The Examiner page had an article by Josephine Tyson on the recent doings of Mme. Bertha Kalich and company, under Daniel Frohman's direction, in Cuba, where "Marta of the Lowlands" and "The Pride of Jennico" were produced. The other Chicago Sunday papers were fully in the running. During week days a great deal of space was given to pictures by every Chicago newspaper. The Kathlyn series has certainly started an epoch-making publicity campaign for pictures.

"From Dusk to Dawn," a five-part production, in which Clarence Darrow, a noted Chicago attorney for labor organizations, prominently appears, was given its premier in several theaters here Sunday, March 1. The scenes are laid in Los Angeles, and the famous trial of the lawyer there is told in the pictures. The members of the jury, before whom he was tried and acquitted, and others prominent in his prosecution and defence, also prominent witnesses, are clearly shown.

H. H. Buckwalter, of Denver, has succeeded in stirring up citizens of that city to carry out a fixed program on March 15, to celebrate the passage of the cruiser Denver through the Panama canal on that date. Elaborate preparations have been made toward that end. Pastors will refer, in their Sunday morning sermons, to the benefits of this great waterway to the nations of the world and to civilization, the usual Sunday afternoon concert will be devoted to the playing of patriotic airs, and an illuminated automobile parade carrying out the impression of marine floats will take place in the evening. Letters from President Wilson, President Porras, of Panama, and Col. Goethals will be read in the afternoon and a speech will be made by Dr. Morales, of Panama. Mr. Buckwalter has spent several months in the canal zone from time to time, taking a complete series of moving pictures showing the construction of the canal from the outset up to the present time. The series, which will also include the events of the official opening of the canal, has been made for the Selig Polyscope Co.

ANNA HELD WANTS DAMAGES.

Anna Held, the well-known actress, who has never been noted for any pronounced aversion to publicity and whose famous milk baths of a quarter of a century ago are still remembered, has brought suit against the Kinemacolor Company for the sum of $250,000. She claims to have been injured to this extent by an alleged unauthorized use of her picture by the Kinemacolor Company. The Kinemacolor Company declare they cannot understand Miss Held's action as they claim to have had her consent to the filming.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

BILLS AFFECTING MASSACHUSETTS EXHIBITORS.

ON Thursday, February 26, two bills affecting the exhibitors in Massachusetts came up for hearing before the Committee on Mercantile Affairs. The first bill, petitioned for by William E. Hickey (House No. 1638), called for legislation for the prevention of the over-crowding of theaters, and other places of public entertainment or resort. The exact reading of this bill follows:

> Section 1. No person shall be admitted to a theater or other place of entertainment when all the seats in such theater or other place are already occupied, and it shall be unlawful to sell, give or exchange any tickets admitting persons to a theater or other place of entertainment in excess of the seating capacity of such theater or other place.
> Section 2. Violation of any provision of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten nor more than one hundred dollars for each offence.

Owing to the fact that nobody appeared in favor of the above bill, it was promptly declared "closed" by the committee. The second bill to come up is as follows:

> Section 1. No moving picture entertainment shall depict a scene, or scenes of murder, bloodshed or violence.
> Section 2. This act shall take effect upon its passage.

The petitioner, Mrs. Carrie O. Barr, spoke in favor of her bill, and afforded a vast deal of mirth and loud laughter to all present, even including the Committee on Mercantile Affairs. Mrs. Barr stated that she never visited the real moving picture theaters, but was informed that many of the reels were bad for the young. A real riot of laughter was occasioned when Mrs. Barr stated that she knew of a child of two years of age who was at present in a hospital—with nervous prostration—due to the baneful after affects of visiting moving picture shows!!! This statement broke up the morale of the meeting, and Mrs. Barr retired saying she had not meant to turn the meeting into a burlesque show.

Judge Brackett appeared for the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, in opposition to the bill. Judge Brackett stated that he had sympathy for Mrs. Barr, who, while well meaning, was obviously entirely ignorant of her subject. The judge pointed out that exhibitors could not be held to account for the extreme youth attending the moving picture theaters, as the law prohibiting children under 14 years of age to attend the theaters, unless accompanied by an adult, was carefully enforced. Judge Brackett called attention to the fact that if scenes of violence were omitted; none of the great classics such as "Julius Caesar" or "Othello" could be shown in pictures, and closed what was considered a most able discourse by showing that the term "violence" might mean almost anything. "Could we show a scenic picture of Niagara Falls, which are very violent and rugged, under the 'Violence' clause?" was Judge Brackett's final shot. There is no doubt but that the bill will be given "leave to withdraw," when the committee reports. The censorship bill, and the amendment to the 20 minute law, are both progressing very favorably to the Massachusetts Exhibitors' League, and there is every reason to believe that no unfair legislation will be enacted into law at this session. HENRY.

MASSACHUSETTS EXHIBITORS' SPECIAL MEETING.

President Ernest H. Horstmann, of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, called a special meeting to order at Rathbone Hall, Washington Street, Boston, at 11 a. m., on Wednesday, February 25, at which the following exhibitors were present: Frank J. Howard, Jacob Lourie, Hugh O'Neill, Frank Wasserman, R. W. Drown, John Patten, J. J. Raymond, General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, and Harry F. Campbell, general manager and treasurer of Warner's Features, of Massachusetts. None of the other exchanges were represented at this meeting, which was of less importance than the last one of the Massachusetts exhibitors, reported in The Moving Picture World of February 28th. It was reported that the league at present has fifty-two members enrolled, and it is anticipated that the meeting to be held at Springfield, Mass., on March 4th, will greatly swell the membership. A good-sized delegation is due to make the Springfield trip from Boston. The Goldstein Brothers' Amusement Company, of Springfield, has arranged for a hall for the meeting.

R. W. Drown, of the committee delegated to keep in touch with Operators' Union, Boston Local No. 182, reported to the meeting that everything was harmonious between the officers of the local and the league, and that nothing had come up since he last reported. On motion of Mr. Harry F. Campbell, a committee of two was appointed to interview all film exchanges not members of the league, and to solicit their coöperation, membership and financial aid. The Mutual Film Exchange of Boston is not a member of the league, although it finally contributed to the defense fund; nor are most of the smaller feature film exchanges. The feeling is that the feature exchanges should be liberal contributors, and loyal workers of the league, and an effort will be made by the committee, Messrs. Raymond and Wasserman, to line these men up.

Harry F. Campbell reported that a movement was on foot to interest the Legislative Committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and to ask its aid against the unjust legislation proposed in the present session of the Massachusetts Legislature. The Chamber of Commerce is a very influential body, and if its coöperation were secured, it would be a most helpful factor.

J. J. Raymond, of Worcester, told of his experiences with local censorship, and Mr. Harry Wasserman related about the report of the Roxbury Welfare League, recently issued.

General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, made an able and well-received plea for coöperation by the various film interests for the common benefit of all concerned, and promised that his exchange was only too willing to do everything in its power—including liberal contributions—to help the league along. Mr. Eslow stated that he had sent out letters to every theater in New England, urging that each exhibitor personally see his local senator, and explain to him the futility of the censorship bill, now pending before the legislature. This attitude of Mr. Eslow's called forth considerable applause.

Since the last meeting of the league there had been no hearings on any of the various bills affecting this industry "on the hill" at Boston. H. F. Campbell, of the legislative Committee of the League, reported that things appeared to be progressing favorably, and that he was keeping in close touch with Judge J. Albert Brackett, the league's attorney. This committee is fully empowered to act for the league on its own discretion, and will render a report of its activities from time to time, as seems desirable. HENRY.

CLEVELAND EXHIBITORS MEET.

Thirty members of the Cleveland Exhibitors' League attended a "get together" meeting at the Gilsey Hotel, Cleveland, Wednesday, February 25. That the exhibitors are their own censors was brought out in the reports of several members who said they returned to their exchanges many pictures which they did not care to show to their audiences. Lack of interest and incongruities were the chief reasons for rejecting the photoplays, it was stated.

L. H. Becht, of the Mall Theater, said he had a film showing Paul Revere making his dash in a big touring car. "It may have been comedy," said Mr. Becht, "but the films are supposed to instruct, and I did not want to show the children a picture like that." Others reported the use of electric lights in pictures supposed to represent scenes of centuries ago.

Edward Kohl, former film exchange man and owner of several theaters in the city, said the manufacturers, in their haste to make money, were turning out many cheaply produced subjects from uninteresting scenarios. "It was one of the aims of the state censors," said Mr. Kohl, "to eliminate such pictures as well as those containing objectionable scenes or action."

President C. A. McGown, who presided, called upon several of the members present and the interesting session continued half the day. Robert Manchester, former burlesque manager and his partners in the Utopia Amusement Company, Messrs. Hopkins and Leoni, who are building a $60,000 theater at Painesville, were among those who spoke.

ILLINOIS LEAGUE CONVENTION APRIL 28.

Arrangements are being made for the state convention of the Illinois Exhibitors' League, which event will be held at Springfield, Ill., on Tuesday and Wednesday, April 28 and 29. The St. Nicholas Hotel will be the headquarters and the local arrangements are in the hands of W. W. Watts, president of the Vaudette Amusement Company, which owns several theaters in the state. George M. Westley, organizer for the league, is in Illinois canvassing exhibitors and reports a probable large attendance The Illinois League has a membership of more than 100 exhibitors outside of the city of Chicago.

KENTUCKY CONVENTION APRIL 21.

There is considerable enthusiasm being aroused among the exhibitors of Kentucky over the state convention of the Kentucky League, which is to be held at Lexington on April 21 and 22. This is Col. Louis H. Ramsey's town and noted throughout the "blue grass" region for its hospitality, so there will be a royal welcome awaiting exhibitors who attend the convention. J. H. Stamper, Jr., is chairman of the convention committee and has received substantial assistance from the Lexington Chamber of Commerce, which desires to make the meeting of picture men a success.

BOOMING THE BROOKLYN BALL.

Brooklyn exhibitors will hold a mass meeting Monday evening, March 9, at the Albany Theater, 1563 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., to complete final arrangements for the big entertainment and ball to be held at Prospect Hall on Monday night, March 16.

This affair promises to be a rousing success. All the leading manufacturers will be present, also the stars of the photoplay world. The grand march will be led by Earle Williams of the Vitagraph Company and Leah Baird of the Universal Company. All the city officials have also promised to be present, and the committee is hustling to introduce some entirely new and novel features never before exhibited. The Kalem Company is going to give to each one entering the hall a souvenir, a bag of the Irish soil imported by the Kalem Company.

GREENPOINT EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

The Greenpoint Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, embracing practically every theater in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, was organized March 3rd. The officers elected were as follows: President, Philip Rosenson; vice-president, H. C. Barrington; secretary-treasurer, David Saks; honorary members, Attorney B. C. Hoff and M. J. Stickel, of the Y. M. C. A.

The executive committee of the Greenpoint Neighborhood Association, having for its interest the benefit of the community, after carefully considering the constitution and by-laws of the association, has approved of them, and will coöperate with the exhibitors, and have enlisted the coöperation of the schools and ministers of Greenpoint. Happily for the exhibitors and the public, educators in Greenpoint have already made suggestions which the exhibitors will carry out. The latter see, in good motion pictures, a mighty force against evil in many forms. It has been proven to the Greenpoint Neighborhood Association that the increased cost of producing pictures and renting them to exhibitors, together with the new laws regulating motion picture theaters, has made it necessary for exhibitors to slightly increase the price of admission at present on Saturday evenings, Sundays and holidays, from a five-cent admission to 10 cents for adults and 5 cents for children.

Meeting-place will be temporarily at the Greenpoint Y. M. C. A., Meserole Avenue, near Manhattan Avenue, where the next meeting will be held Tuesday evening, March 10th, at 8 p.m.

PRESIDENT NEFF COMES EAST.

On his way to New York, President Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, addressed exhibitors at Washington, D. C., Baltimore and Philadelphia. He arrived in New York Sunday, March 8.

Ford Sterling a Universal Star.

Ford Sterling.

FORD STERLING and his two comedy associates of the "Keystone" brand have surely joined the Universal. As stated last week, Mr. Sterling becomes the star of the new Sterling Motion Picture Company, which will manufacture comedies exclusively for the Universal program. Fred Balshofer, the original organizer and producer of the "101 Bison" films, who recently resigned from the New York Motion Picture Company, to form and take charge of the new company, becomes its president.

Henry Pathe Lehrman, who has won wide fame both as a director and originator of many of the bright ideas that went into the Keystone, becomes secretary and treasurer of the new corporation. Robert Thornby, who is also inseparably attached with the success of these comedies, becomes a director under the new banners.

Ford Sterling got his start in life in La Crosse, Wis. It was in the year 1880, and the exact date was Nov. 3. After he had attained the dignity of long trousers, La Crosse ceased to attract him, and he ran away, when he was seventeen years old and joined the old Robinson circus. He was known in the world of the sawdust and tinsel as "Keno, the Boy Clown." Later he played "rep," and still later vaudeville called him for its own. After running the gamut of amusement experience, playing with the Four Mortons, the Rays, Otis Skinner and William Gillette, Sterling joined the forces of the silent drama in 1912, with Mack Sennett at the Biograph. He followed Sennett to the "Keystone" and now he has come under the Universal banners.

Fred J. Balshofer.

Harry Pathe Lehrman.

To encourage suggestions for a new name for the brand that the Sterling Motion Picture Company will release on the Universal Program, the Universal offers a reward of $25 for the best appellation submitted before March 20. The name must have a particular application to the object of the company, the production of comedy, and all letters thereon must be sent to Fred Balshofer himself, at Hollywood, California.

ROTHAPFEL RETURNS.

S. L. Rothapfel returned to New York, Wednesday, March 4th, on the S. S. Kaiser Wilhelm II, after a stormy voyage. After making a careful inspection of the picture theaters in England and the Continent, he declared that the Europeans had nothing on America in the way of fine houses, and that our finest had no equals over there. Mr. Rothapfel will have the management of the Strand Theater on Broadway and 48th Street, New York, when it opens in April.

Boosting Pathe Pictures.

Pathe Freres Makes Alliance With the Hearst Dailies Inaugurating Big Advertising Campaign.

NO PLAN for the exploitation of motion pictures in the public press since motion pictures became a popular form of public amusement in this country quite equals in magnitude that which has been adopted by Pathe Freres to popularize the product of that well-known concern. The plan is no less than an alliance with the string of big daily newspapers published by William R. Hearst and a large list of allied dailies in the Hearst syndicate. The Hearst dailies are published in New York, Boston, Chicago, Atlanta, Los Angeles and San Francisco, and are read by several million people every day; what the effect of widespread advertising of this nature will have upon the public can hardly be estimated. In the manner in which it is being handled it would be worth millions of dollars to almost any other commercial project; that it will create a lively interest in Pathe productions cannot be successfully controverted. As a clever stroke of business enterprise it presents the marks of rare acumen, the equal of which has seldom been displayed in the motion picture industry.

The idea of an alliance between some great newspaper and the motion picture maker was conceived by Edward A. McManus, a well-known magazine man, then engaged with the McClure Company. Mr. McManus' first insight into the picture business was gained in connection with the popular "What Happened to Mary" series issued by the Edison Company about two years ago in conjunction with a story of similar title published in the Ladies' World. This idea was also McManus' and was so successful that he couldn't stop thinking about pictures until he finally developed the big idea which Mr. Hearst adopted when it was presented to him.

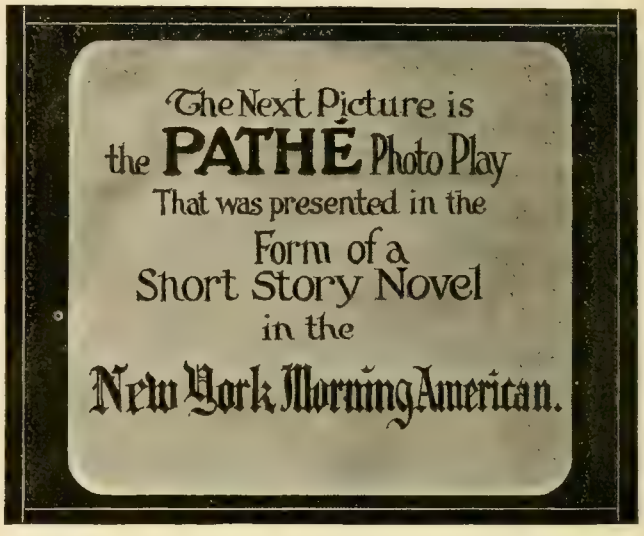
It has been a matter of considerable satisfaction to Mr. McManus to observe that the Edison Company, which undertook the "What Happened to Mary" series only after considerable persuasion, found the plan so successful that it has since started six similar serial pictures with as many different publications.

Mr. L. P. Bonvillain, vice-president of Pathe Freres, was asked as to the results of the alliance with the Hearst newspapers. "We are much gratified," he said. "From our reports we are led to believe that the scheme is bringing to the picture theaters a new clientele—a fresh class of people is becoming interested. We can now, through the medium of all these newspapers, which cover so large a portion of the more thickly settled sections of the country, tell the story of the picture in a satisfactorily complete form. We can do fully what the sub-titles try to do: we can make more intelligible all the happenings of the play; we can analyze character, explain motives—we can, if you will, amplify the action and set forth those things which cannot be shown on the screen. If a man may be attracted to a theater by reading and studying a poster in the lobby, is it not reasonable that he will be more surely drawn into that house to see portrayed on the screen events and conflicts of character, of dramas, of tragedies, and even of comedies interesting descriptions of which he has already absorbed?

"If a man is interested in a film story he will want to see the picture afterward. The plot appeals to his imagination—the screened production materializes that story to his eye."



"Don't you think, Mr. Bonvillain, the working out of this idea will result in better synopses—that is, that greater attention than has heretofore been bestowed on this formal introduction to the script will be paid to the literary side?"

"Beyond question," was the prompt response. "It means that we have got to study the literary side of our stories, as well as the more technically dramatic—that we have got to expend on language the same thought and skill that the producer does on action. The 'stories of the films' have now in the Pathe Studio a new meaning—we certainly will try to make them as interesting as we endeavor to make our pictures entertaining."

"This unique advertising scheme—if you will permit me so to denominate it—must mean much to the exhibitor?" asked THE WORLD man.

"Indeed it does," replied Mr. Bonvillain. "Instead of limiting the advertising of the picture to the very door of a theater we are carrying it further. We are going into the whole city, into the whole of many cities, to try and bring customers to him, to attract them to his place. It seems to me it would be feasible for exhibitors showing Pathe films to have these stories framed as they appear—that it, for such as are unable for one reason or another to secure first runs—so that they may be accessible to their patrons until such time as the subjects are shown. Has anything like this general scheme been attempted before? So far as we know it has not, anywhere in the world.

"The same amount of publicity in display advertising as Pathe films are receiving to-day would, in the case of the ordinary commercial product, cost several hundreds of thousands of dollars. Advertising to that extent would meet with instant response from the retailer. It is up to the exhibitor to use retail methods. If he will do so he will get results that will be of inestimable value to him."

"I think it is fair to point out," said Mr. Bonvillain, "that the credit for originating this idea rests with Mr. Hearst. He gave his own thought to it and directed the efforts of his staff to it and put the thing on its feet. I also desire to add that we are believing so much in Mr. Hearst's scheme that Pathe Freres have decided that instead of releasing some films that we had marked for a feature service, to place them in our regular straight program and give the exhibitors the full benefit of this departure.

"Pathe Freres will make every effort to aid the exhibitor in obtaining Pathe films when he wants them, and as often as he wants them. To that end any communications will receive prompt personal attention."

The scheme adopted by Pathe Freres to utilize this abundance of publicity placed at its disposal is to publish in the morning editions of the several Hearst papers stories of the pictures as released from day to day, with a scene from the picture, together with a list of picture theaters in the territory covered by the newspaper's circulation where the pictures will be shown. There is no charge to the owner of the picture theater for listing his house in this directory. Frequently an entire page of the paper is required to publish the story of the picture and the list of theaters.

Pathe Freres is advertising extensively its alliance with the Hearst papers in the trade publications and the publicity matter sent out to theater managers. Slides have also been supplied to theaters, to be thrown on the screen, and large quantities of posters are being used to give further publicity to the plan. These are furnished free to theater managers. Reproductions of the slides and one of the posters are shown herewith.

Unquestionably, this large campaign of advertising will result in an increased demand for Pathe pictures. Pathe Freres realize this and have made arrangements to take care of that demand by installing emergency exchanges in the cities in which the Hearst papers are published. Under the agreement between the licensed manufacturers and the Motion Picture Patents Company, Pathe Freres has the right to do this without disturbing the existing arrangement for the distribution of pictures with the General Film Company and, consequently, have opened an exchange at 3 Tremont Row, Boston, with Samuel Bernfield in charge. John Pelzer is now in Chicago arranging to open an exchange in that city.

Regarding this action Vice-President Bonvillain authorized the statement that it was not to be construed as antagonistic to the General Film Company, but that it was planned more to aid that company by developing a larger demand for Pathe pictures. "In this way we are able to supply any immediate and unforseen demand for our pictures which the General Film Company, with its large clientele might not be in position to supply at the moment and would not be justified to provide for, while the effects of our big advertising plans are problematical."

APEX PULLS A BRAND NEW STUNT.

IN THE feature film business, P. P. Craft, of the Apex Film Company, has always been a leader. It was he who started the State Rights ball rolling in America by marketing the first feature of that description.

Now he has started another innovation which will soon be in general use. The new idea is music in the demonstrating room. There are many good features that fall flat on the bare screen of an exhibition room because they have climaxes that must be worked up to be effective. This is particularly true of war pictures. It is all very well to say that if the picture has the punch it will show up just as well without music as it will with it, or that the buyer can imagine how it will get over to an audience; but that theory has proved to be a fallacy. The average film buyer is extremely short on imagination and it is not safe for a feature film concern to leave anything to the buyer's sense of imagination. Many a good war picture has fared badly at the hands of critics who could not imagine the necessary musical accompaniment.

Convinced that this condition is a fact, Mr. Craft decided to inaugurate the musical accompaniment to his features to make sure that they will be shown to the best possible advantage. Accordingly he installed a piano and engaged Prof. Hamburger, leader of the Ansonia Hotel Orchestra, to provide the cue music for the Apex Films. Prof. Hamburger will be in attendance at the Apex offices during the daytime and will play the pictures for buyers and critics. He will also devote some time to arranging musical scores for the Apex features which will be furnished to buyers in printed form to go along with the reels wherever exhibited.

AN INTERESTING CHARACTER.

AN interesting character and a man well-known in European film circles passed through the city the other day on his way to Panama where he intends to make several multiple reel dramas with a genuine Panama atmosphere. He is Joseph Delmont, a director in the employ of the Bioscope Company, of Berlin, Germany.

Joseph Delmont.

Mr. Delmont opened his "sealed orders" as he came in on the belated "President Lincoln" and discovered he had just enough time to take a quick lunch and then go on to Central America. Delmont, though a native of Austria, has spent many years in this country. The last three or four years he has been a director connected with some of the most important motion picture producers of Germany. Some of the features he directed, such as "Nemesis," "The Black Mask," and "Red Powder," have been well received in this country.

Delmont is a keen observer and makes a specialty of studying public taste. He thinks that the American picture is losing ground in Europe because it is too conventional.

"This fault, however," he said to a World man, "is not confined to your side of the Atlantic. The same is true of Europe. The trouble lies largely with the exhibitor and the film buyer who judges the public by his own likes and dislikes. We started a campaign of inquiry in Berlin and other parts of the Empire, taking votes among the picture patrons of various grades of houses. We found that the sentimental stuff was least popular, getting only about 7 per cent. of the total vote, while realism and comedy and sensational films proved to be popular in the order named. We know that life, as it is lived by us and all around us, is not full of happy endings. People want to see life portrayed as it actually is, not as it ought to be. No country in the world can be compared with yours in your natural opportunities, your actors and actresses, your spirit of enterprise and initiative, and you are destined to lead the motion picture industry. You must, however, get away from the melodrama and from the conventional."

Mr. Delmont will be in the wilds of Central America for the next two months and will stop in New York on his way back to Europe.

MELIES TWO-A-WEEK.

It is announced by G. Melies that the large and increasing popularity of the new Melies brand of comedies, "General," has prompted them to issue a second release of this brand on Mondays.

The first Monday release will be issued about April 6th. It will be comedy each week, as is their Thursday release, thus this company will offer two comedies a week.

An especially good selection of subjects has already been made for the Monday release, and it is expected, in view of the shortage of one-reel comedies in the licensed program on that day of the week, that this release will soon attain the popularity now enjoyed by their Thursday release.

WINIK ON THE LUSITANIA.

A cablegram has been received from Mr. H. Winik, of the Apex Features, Ltd., 35 Little Newport St., London, W., England, stating that he was sailing for New York on the "Lusitania" and bringing with him sample copies of two great European productions, the rights of which he has secured for the United States and Canada. The cablegram failed to give the names of the productions or their producers, but it is evident that there is a big surprise in store for the theatrical managers as well as the motion picture fraternity at large, as the fact that Mr. Winik is coming to America personally coupled with his well-known astuteness and discrimination, is positive indication that the big productions he has with him are likely to make Broadway sit up and take notice.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

ON THE invitation of Nathan Machet, of Machet & Picker, lessees of the Burland Theater, we traveled up to the Bronx on the evening of Tuesday, March 3rd, to witness a de luxe presentation of "Quo Vadis?" The Burland has seating capacity for 2,500 persons. There are about 1,900 chairs in the orchestra. In the balcony are 130 box seats. The house, which, by the way, is a straight picture theater, is handsomely decorated without being overdecorated. There is an orchestra of eight pieces. To supplement this there will shortly be put in operation a Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra. The instrument is already installed, and work on the wiring is proceeding. The projection is from the rear of the balcony; the throw is nearly flat, and at a range of 158 feet. The screen is about 16 by 22, and is a gold fiber. Backing up against the rear of the theater is an "airdome" with a seating capacity of 3,500. This will be in use about four or five months in the year. The entire establishment has a frontage of 460 feet, running on Prospect Avenue from One Hundred and Sixty-third to One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Street. The investment represents a half million dollars. Machet & Picker hold a twenty-one-year lease.

Mr. Machet has been connected with the house for about two months. The theater is filled every night in the week, on some occasions many being turned away. The admission is ordinarily 10 cents. Asked as to the pictures exhibited in his new house, Mr. Machet said, "We show the market." The evening performance runs practically from 7 to 11, with two five-minute intermissions. Mr. Machet has had wide experience as an exhibitor, having for four years conducted the Nostrand Theater in Brooklyn, which house he still controls. Mr. Picker's connection with amusements has been more in a theatrical line, but he said Tuesday night pictures were the coming thing.

As to "Quo Vadis?" It certainly was a fine production. The orchestra had put in five hours of study following the Sunday night performance, and had completed a list of selections that materially added to the effectiveness of the subject. Before and once during the showing of the picture, A. Leon Kronfeldt sang "The Rosary." John De Persia, the staff lecturer of the house, as a prelude recited a selection from the text of the story, and as an interlude "The Burning of Rome." Mr. De Persia, arrayed in Roman garb, stood in a spotlight, while on the screen was thrown a light that looked like the sky glare of a conflagration. The subject was to be shown for three nights, and the admission was advanced to 25 cents. The fine projection of a new print on the gold fiber screen was worth the long journey to the Bronx.

The young blizzard which struck the metropolitan district on March 1st caused much trouble over in Jersey. At the Pathe plant in Jersey City the falling wires caused a cessation of work, there being no lights for thirty-six hours. On March 2nd the piled-up snow was responsible for the collapse of eighty-nine panes of glass, which have since been replaced. The Centaur Studio in Bayonne was also deprived of power for a while.

Miss Mabel Motography Condon, out in Chicago for a "rest week" (isn't it singular that any one should go from New York to Chicago for a rest?), laments the absence of skating ice in the lake metropolis. Miss Mabel, accustomed to the blasts of Chicago, wondered during December and January when New York had its winter. It was suggested that she be patient. She was one of the many who went from New York to New Rochelle on the night of the Thanhouser celebration. At 2 o'clock in the morning when the New Yorkers were waiting for a train the thermometer down in the weather bureau was 6 below zero. No one in Thanhouserville had the hardihood to guess how many degrees below zero it was in that town. Sufficient to say Miss Condon was satisfied that New York does sometimes get a little winter. "But," she added with enthusiasm, "I got some good skating out of it."

Letters from Herbert Brenon tell of the improved condition of the Imp-Universal director, still in hospital in Bermuda as the result of the collapse of the tank in which with Miss Annette Kellermann he was enacting a scene in "Neptune's Daughter," a feature production. Mr. Brenon, at the last time of writing, had enjoyed his first ride; but the exertion had tired him. The scales showed that he had lost twenty-eight pounds. No wonder. It was a harrowing experience Mr. Brenon went through. He had been in the water a half hour when the accident happened. Then it was forty-five minutes before a surgeon reached him. When he was removed to the hospital it was found that he had six cuts, ranging from four to eighteen inches in length. The surgeons were two and half hours sewing up the wounds. Mr. Brenon, by the tone of his last letter, is getting restive and anxious to be back at work. He says he cannot tell when that time will be, as the healing process seems very slow.

The making of moving pictures is not all cakes and ale.

Word comes from Chicago that the censors have cut out the dueling scene in "The Three Musketeers." If this be true, and the many strange things that have happened in that sadly censored town incline one to believe it is, about the only man who could be trusted to comment on the situation with any degree of moderation would be one just at the beginning of recuperation from a severe illness.

"Detective Finn"

Three Reels—Manufacturers' Film Agency.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature manifestly of British origin has one exceedingly clever actor in its cast of characters—a most intelligent bulldog, referred to in the subtitles as "The Dog with a Human Instinct." It seems that a detective in search of a stolen diamond has fallen into the hands of three London criminals, two men and a woman. The detective is trussed up with more care than is usual in these stories and is left to his doom. The doom threatens in the shape of a time-clock which in half an hour is to drop a lighted fuse into a bomb or infernal machine of some sort. As the detective is on the lounge right close up to the infernal machine it will be seen that his plight is truly deplorable. Happily for him, his bulldog misses him. The bulldog, handsome in his extreme ugliness, leaves the office of his master and finds him in the den of the "crooks" just as the fuse is bending dangerously near the inflammable matter. This situation may not be entirely novel, but it never fails to thrill, and here an element of both humor and pathos is added by the action of the dog. The animal bites the ropes in pieces and sets its agonized master free. The latter, who even in the most trying moments had never lost his smile entirely, is now confronted by another problem. The chief of the criminal trio is on his way to the Dover Continental Express with the diamond in his possession. If he makes the connection with the boat Finn is beaten. Obviously this could never be permitted to happen; a fast auto is therefore hired and there is a heartbreaking race between the car and the Dover Continental Express. Finn gets to the landing station just a minute ahead of the criminal. The latter is about to embark in the boat when he finds his wrists gripped in steel bracelets, a prisoner of the redoubtable Finn.

A new thing in this detective story is the tracing of the culprit by means of a perfume. There is also a thrilling fight on the top of a London 'bus and a hair-raising chase of the detective after the criminal over the roofs of many houses.

I cannot say much for the acting of the principal characters in the film. The man who played the part of Lord Gray is perfectly calm and stolid under the most provoking circumstances, the "criminals" verge on the burlesque. The feature is not without its good points, but there is a lack of finish, to which American audiences are by no means indulgent.

OH, YOU END SEAT HOG.

On the end seat next to the aisle is the end seat hog. He comes in while business is dull and takes the aisle seat, wrapping his legs around the furniture. He stays for two shows. Eight persons have to climb over him to get to their seats. And, before he is ready to leave, each of them has to climb back over him to get out. Each time he submits to the interruption grumblingly. This is the type of man whose forefathers were drawn and quartered and hung on the London bridge to dry.—South Bend (Ind.) Tribune.

NEW THEATER FOR WILMINGTON, DEL.

The Victoria theater on Market Street, near Ninth, is the name of the new moving picture theater which has recently been opened in Wilmington, Del. The new house has a frontage of 32 feet by a depth of 142 feet. It is a fireproof structure, and has a seating capacity of 1,000. The theater is under the management of E. A. Rambonset, who has had many years experience in the picture business.

Balsdon Takes New Position

Manager of the General Film Poster Department Resigns to Become General Manager of the Photoplay Theaters Company.

A TRUE and complete story of the life of George Balsdon would read like a famous book of fiction, but as this is not the place for fiction, or truth which is stranger, it is not our purpose to print a story of his life—merely to give a bit of his connection with the motion picture business and announce his acceptance of a new and important position in the exhibition field. Therefore, we will begin at the end of the story and declare the fact that Mr. Balsdon resigned his position as manager of the poster department of the General Film Company, taking effect March 1st, and has accepted the position of general manager of the Photoplay Theaters Company.

Ever heard of the Photoplay Theaters Company? Yes, no? Yes and no; first as proprietors of the famous Regent Theater, and then in connection with a number of rumors regarding the construction and purchase of picture theaters in various parts of the country, but beyond that nothing definite has been permitted to become public regarding the plans of the company. The lid is still down and someone is sitting heavily upon it with no intention of getting off voluntarily at this writing.

GEORGE BALSDON.

General Manager of the Photoplay Theaters Company.

This much is permitted that the company has some five houses under its control, most of which are under construction, but of which there are two doing business—the Regent in New York and the Regent in Richmond—with many excellent propositions to build or take over picture theaters in leading cities. This brings us to the reason for Mr. Balsdon—the practical man who will take charge of these several propositions and whip them into shape.

Few men in the motion picture business to-day have been in the business longer or have had a wider experience than Mr. Balsdon. "Pop" Rock is wont to refer to the fact that he opened a picture theater in New Orleans in 1896. Balsdon harks back to the same date, and one of his partners in the exhibition business left him about that time to join Mr. Rock—so, you will observe, he dates back some. He was first in the mutoscope business, with interests all over the country. It was an easy step from mutoscopes to picture theaters, so the year 1904 found him running one in Washington, Pa. Later he went to Pittsburgh, from which city he operated a chain of houses. In 1906 he was building theaters and operating a supply house, and in 1909 he was making posters especially designed for the needs of the picture theater, for there were no lithographed posters in those days.

Mr. Balsdon's poster business developed rapidly; he soon established branch offices of his Pittsburgh house in Cleveland, Detroit and Columbus, which business he conducted profitably until 1913 when he sold to the General Film Company and contracted with that company to establish poster departments in its several branches. Coming to New York he installed three departments in as many branches of the General Film Company here and then in the branches in Buffalo, Boston, Albany, Bangor, Cincinnati, Kansas City, St. Louis and Milwaukee. His work was of the most systematic character and so thoroughly satisfactory that his desire to resign was received with genuine regret and reluctantly complied with by the General Film Company, which greatly desired him to remain. But, sincere though the protestations of the General Film Company were, Mr. Balsdon realized that there was a greater field for him in the position offered by the Photoplay Theaters Company, and he severed a very pleasant connection with the best wishes of his former employers and is now busy with the details of the new work.

Mr. Balsdon brings with him to the new position a knowledge ripe from long experience in operating and supplying theaters. It is an experience best calculated to fit a man for such a position and, with his hand at the helm, the affairs of the Photoplay Theaters Company may be expected to develop rapidly and to assume tangible form, all of which is another story.

REINA VALDEZ.

MISS VALDEZ first caught the public eye from behind the footlights in the "Merry Widow." It was here she first attracted the attention of a Lubin director, and not long after found herself on the Mexican border, playing leads in the Lubin company stationed there. Here she had many thrilling experiences in that war-ridden country, the Mexican rebellion being in full blast at the time, and after being once held a prisoner by one of the lawless bands, and otherwise interfering with her peace of mind, she concluded to seek more congenial fields, and for the last year has been associated with the Western Division of the Essanay Company at Niles, Cal.

Reina Valdez.

Miss Valdez prefers drama and emotional scenes, for which her classic beauty is so well adapted—the dark Spanish type, lithe of figure and restless eyes.

Springfield, Mass., is her home town, and one of her greatest delights is in reading over the letters and newspaper clippings sent her whenever an Essanay comes to town featuring her, for she is a warm favorite there, and business is practically at a standstill when her pictures come to town. "It's mighty nice to have the old home town so proud of you," she says. Very true, for only too often it is the case of "A prophet is without honor in his own country."

Miss Valdez's unfailing good nature was illustrated the other day in taking an outside scene requiring a spectacular jump from a high porch to the ground, that was successfully executed, had not a sympathetic bystander stepped into the picture to offer her assistance. This, of course, meant a retake. On the second trial, the cameraman, in his politest manner, announced that as the film had buckled in the takeup magazine, it would have to be taken over.

"Well, while my spirit is willing, the soles of my feet are getting mighty tender," she admitted, "but here goes." This time all went well, and she was glad of the ride back to the studio in the big car.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"A STRANGE MELODY" (Lubin).

It is said that "Music hath charms to sooth the savage breast." Here is a man, a gambler, and one of the wickedest of his kind, he had killed and would kill on a slight provocation. There was no sentiment or softness in his heart, he was simply a brute, but he had a passion for music. One evening a girl, coming to him to plead that he would save her brother from the gambling fever, played a sacred air. The brute was charmed and offered a big price if she could teach him to play it. The price she wanted was the reformation of her brother. The gambler gave her her chance and she succeeded so well that at last she decoyed him to the organ loft of the church, there in the quiet Sanctury of holyness he fell in love and begged her to tell him how he could make himself worthy of the love of so sweet a girl, she told him to change his life from wickedness to worthiness and he did. The sacred melody had saved a soul, made the brute a man and won a Christian wife. The leading roles were played by Carol Halloway and Joseph Smiley.

"SHADOWS" (Essanay).

On Friday, March 20th, The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company will release a sensational detective melodrama. Advance information is to the effect that this two-reel story contains many novel features.

Two of the features mentioned are: The gigantic concrete door controlled by a secret electric button; this is used as an entrance to the counterfeiters' den. The huge safe with the panel door connecting the front room to the stairway leading into the den; these are operated many times to give the onlooker a chance to satisfy his curiosity.

The story is new and the situations are thrilling. A gang of counterfeiters have managed to pass the "queer" on several of the town's largest merchants. Police headquarters have been notified and the newspapers are fairly filled with the story. A detective and reporter are assigned to get the story and the criminal. The reporter is captured by the gang, and the detective, in the disguise of a telephone repairman, is trapped in the den. A fight takes place—an explosion occurs, and altogether it is extremely sensational. Francis X. Bushman plays the role of the detective and Irene Warfield handles the role of the newspaper reporter.

CALIFORNIA BIG FLOOD PICTURES.

Kalem released on Friday, March 6, a five hundred foot special picture of scenes of the recent floods which caused such great havoc in the vicinity of Los Angeles, Cal., during the latter part of February. Many of the scenes were taken when the flood was at its height showing falling of buildings and other thrilling incidents.

"THE GAMBLER'S PENALTY" (Great Northern).

With Miss Rita Sacchetta featured in the role of the Princess Spinarosa, wife of a profligate nobleman, this three-reel photodrama contains many appealing elements and is calculated to prove a film offering out of the ordinary. The plot is novel in the process of its unwinding and a series of unexpected situations lend zest to an interest which has been aroused from the beginning. The versatile art of Miss Sacchetto is shown to excellent advantage in a film role that calls for many strong emotional periods as well as the terpsichorean evolutions which have made her a favorite on two continents.

The story carries one from the castle of the Prince Spinarosa in the suburbs of one of the European capitals to the rugged Far West of America. The Princess, estimable by birth and training, and the mother of two children, is obliged to adopt the profession of a classical dancer by reason of the gambling propensities of her husband and consents to make a tour of America. It is while she is appearing in California that fate decrees her path must be crossed again by the Prince Spinarosa. Having lost his fortune over the gambling table, the nobleman emigrates and finds employment as a bartender in a small town in which his wife is to appear as a dancer. An exciting scene in the theater after the Prince, roused to frenzy, has fired a shot at his wife; the chase and capture by irate cowboys, the averted lynching and other stirring episodes punctuate the absorbing story.

Scene from "The Gambler's Penalty" (Gt. Northern).

In this, as well as the earlier productions in which Miss Sacchetto has appeared under the auspices of the Great Northern "Preferred Feature Attractions," the support is excellent and the details are appealing from the standpoint of staging and photography.

EMBY COMPANY REPORTS PROSPERITY.

Harry Brotkin, of the Emby Feature Film Company, which is buying from four to six multiple reel features every week for distribution in New York State and City and Jersey City, reports a general spirit of contentment among exhibitors in the Hudson River valley and in the Lake counties. L. F. Fisk, of the Emby New York office, reports a wide demand for sensational melodramas with good, clean stories, but not necessarily of absolute perfection as works of art. Stories that are easy to understand, clear and simple, preferably novel, but thrilling without mawkish sentimentality or unwholesome situations are what the Emby Company is aiming at. It has through the Vernon Company, of Philadelphia, P. C. Graff, president, agents in London, Paris, and Berlin who will select three or four of the best Pathes every month and with these the Emby Company will take the offerings of the Pasquali, Ammex, Itala and Metropolitan companies, together with any other especially worthy production that may be offered to it.

The Primagraf Company, whose work the Emby people will also handle in its territory, has opened the Law Studio, 302 East 38th Street, New York City, for the production of multiple reel feature pictures from stage and literary masterpieces. The first offering, now under way, is "The Black Cross," a story taken from the Hungarian. The picture is under the direction of Frank Coygne, recently of the Ruby Feature Company, who produced "The Hounds of the Underworld," "The Dock Rats," and other features. He has taken with him as leading woman, Miss Kellity, who was seen in several Ruby offerings. Bob Gamp, Frank Briscoe and Matt Sharp, all of the Ruby Company, are also with him.

"A MODERN FREE-LANCE" (American).

Being employed in a newspaper office gave Robert Randall excellent training in the art of writing. His mind possessed a well developed power of imagination and he improved his spare time in writing plays, which should have been in his favor, but he overdid it and often reported late for work, which resulted in his losing his position.

The play he was writing was to be his masterpiece and after he lost his job he worked incessantly at it until finished. With the completion of the work came added troubles—his money gave out, his typewriter was taken in lieu of board and he was evicted.

Scene from "A Modern Free Lance" (American).

With difficulty he succeeded in getting producers to consent to read his play, and when it was finally accepted he was in a hospital recuperating from a beating he had received from ruffians because he dared to offer protection to a woman being insulted.

When his cup of bitterness was about full and the struggle seemed too great there came a change for the better. His play had proved the hit of the season. A large check for royalties awaited him and the countenance of dame fortune smiled broadly on him. A human interest permeates the entire story and the production is entitled to highest merit. The usual "Flying A" quality prevails. It will be released in two parts on March 16. Ed Coxen and Winifred Greenwood play the leads in commendable manner.

MARION LEONARD BACK WITH WARNER'S.

From the executive offices of Warner's Features, Inc., in Forty-Sixth Street, comes the announcement that Marion Leonard has concluded negotiations whereby all of her feature productions of three reels and over will be released exclusively by the branch exchanges of that organization.

This interesting bit of news is of especial interest to those exhibitors who have run most of Miss. Leonard's pictures and who have come to realize that she is an excellent drawing card, but who have been confused by the numerous announcements as to her releases.

Miss Leonard's first Warner's Feature—"The Rose of Yesterday"—will be followed by "Donna Isolla" and "Judgment," two dramatic features of the highest quality.

Commenting upon her new agreement with Warner's Features, Inc., Miss Leonard expressed herself as delighted over the prospects of again reaching the thousands of loyal fans who have followed her career in motion pictures with unflagging interest and devotion. Stanner E. V. Taylor, who produces all of the Leonard pictures, also seemed gratified with the new arrangement and spoke enthusiastically of his plans to produce a series of absolutely unique features.

"LOST IN DARKNESS" (Itala).

A story in four parts which hinges upon the effect produced by the sudden accession to affluence of a comparatively poor man. A young engineer in a country town receives the good news of his appointment to an important position in a large city. His first impulse is to promise his young wife all sorts of luxuries in his new found promotion. He becomes a rich and prosperous inventor and attracting the attentions of a woman of position, neglects his young wife. This girl, however, is of a forgiving disposition and a reconciliation ensues. But the husband is disloyal and reverts to his fashionable enchantress. An explosion at his works blinds him. The wife in disguise engages herself as his nurse and the fashionable woman deserts him, not, however, before descending to the meanness of attempting to rob her blind victim of the remains of the money she had helped him dissipate. A fortunate restoration of his sight reunites him to his always forgiving wife.

Scene from "Lost in Darkness" (Itala).

This is a four-part picture in which the Itala Company has included some magnificent settings that have been photographed with the usual care. The drama is acted with great power all through. "Lost in Darkness" is the longest and by far the most ambitious of recent Itala releases.

"TWO LITTLE VAGABONDS" (Selig).

The gifted Italian, who made his romance, "The Heart of a Boy," a modern classic, gave interesting angles of the many sided youth. A new and clever point of view comes in a pair of city waifs, who seek the solace of the country, but find it monotonous compared to their cheerless but beloved city. A sweet juvenile romance is woven in this little story of adventure, which indicates that one girl's cleverness is on the average equal to that of three boys. This latest Selig chapter of child-life is painted close to nature and is as convincing as it is interesting. The clever children enlisted in this are: Roy Clark, Max Verner, Birgilio Morales, and Utanah La Reno. This subject will be released March 20.

"THE PRICE OF VANITY" (Vitagraph).

There are two human tendencies set forth in this Vitagraph drama that teach two beneficial lessons. One is that we should not allow our ambitions for social prominence, and vieing with our neighbors, to lead us into extravagances beyond our means; and secondly, we should be slow to misinterpret the good intentions of our friends to their or our own disadvantage. The first mistake is made by the wife, and the second by the husband in this very interesting story. The third party, of whom the husband is unjustly jealous, saves them both from making a more serious mistake, proving he was not an intruder, but a true friend. There is a common interest in pictures of this kind that brings before us weaknesses that should be guarded and makes us see ourselves as we very often see others. Release day, Tuesday, March 17th.

Scene from "The Price of Vanity" (Vitagraph).

"BROTHER OFFICERS" (Apex).

This story, pictured in three reels and laid in the Far East, is full of thrills and interest. The plot briefly told deals with the sacrifice of a British officer in the India service. This officer, Lieutenant Trevor, has won the favor of the colonel of his regiment. In a hot fight with a native tribe the Colonel had saved Trevor's life. When the Colonel's son is brought on from England to join the service his father asks Trevor to "keep an eye on the boy." The son yields to the fascination of the card table. He is soon heavily involved and in a desperate effort to recoup his losses he resorts to cheating. The cheating is discovered and just as suspicion begins to point to the Colonel's son the Lieutenant steps to the front and declares that he has been the "cheat." He is put under arrest and his career seems at an end when an insurrection breaks out among the hill tribes and he is sent out to fight the hostiles. The Colonel, in entrusting him with the command, intimates that it will be best for him to come back on a stretcher. Trevor goes to the rescue of a plantation threatened by the hostile tribes. A desperate battle ensues in which the fortunes of war waver until, through the superhuman bravery of Trevor, the victory at last remains with the English. In the fight the son of the Colonel has been badly wounded and makes a full confession of his guilt fully exonerating Trevor. The ending is very happy all around.

THE ANGELUS CAMERA.

A Western made camera that is bidding for recognition is the "Angelus" A1, which is made by the Los Angeles Motion Picture Company, of 215 East Washington Street, Los Angeles, Cal. The first talking point in favor of this camera is its dimensions. The measurements are 5x10x13, which give it compactness while providing space for 400 feet of film inside the case. The makers of this instrument claim for it fifteen distinct advantages and, according to the itemized list these advantages show that someone thoroughly experienced with motion picture camera work has had a hand in its making. Its evident practicability could never have been thought out by anyone other than a person who had seen much field work with a camera and who was fully aware of the real needs and difficulties of the cameraman. It is also evident that this camera was designed to eliminate all the sins of commission and omission that have been peculiar to such instruments heretofore.

"THE GREAT DIAMOND ROBBERY."

Daniel V. Arthur, one of the leading theatrical producers of America, has capitulated to the artistic claims of modern photoplay production, and, in the name of the Playgoers' Film Company, of which he is the managing director, Mr. Arthur announces the first of a series of film dramas produced on a scale of magnificence and splendor. "The Great Diamond Robbery" is the play selected by Mr. Arthur to make his debut as a film producer, and he has given it a production characterized by far greater magnificence and perfectness of enactment than was ever accorded the play during its long life in the legitimate theaters of America. "The Great Diamond Robbery" is one of the few really immortal melodramas, and universally ranked as a more thrilling and exceptional work than any of the "Sherlock Holmes" stories. "The Great Diamond Robbery" was originally produced by the late A. M. Palmer and T. Henry French at the American Theater, New York, where it ran for more than a solid year.

Scene from "The Great Diamond Robbery" (Playgoers).

The action throughout the piece is unusually brisk and engaging, and the tracing and ultimate recovery of the precious jewels after years of search constitutes one of the most exciting plays imaginable. Mr. Arthur has assembled his cast with rare care and insight. Wallace Eddinger, the foremost of the younger male stars upon the American stage, interprets with delicious jest and convincingness the part of Dick Brummage, the indomitable detective-hero of the play. Supporting Mr. Eddinger is one of the finest companies that has ever appeared before a camera—Elita Proctor Otis, for years considered one of the best character actresses in the country; Gail Kane, who was featured last season in Winthrop Ames' production of "The Affairs of Anatol"; Dorothy Arthur, Charles J. Ross, Martin Alsop, P. B. Pratt, Edward Gillespie, Robt. E. Graham and a long cast of Broadway favorites.

In the illustration given herewith are Gail Kane and Martin J. Alsop, both of whom are now playing leading roles in "Seven Keys to Baldpate" in the Astor Theater, New York.

GREENE'S FEATURES.

Walter E. Greene, long identified with the exchange business in New England, as well as being owner of a circuit of motion picture theaters down East, opened a feature film sales business under the name of Greene's Feature Photo Plays, Inc., and has installed an office staff in commodious offices in suite 501 in the World's Tower Bldg., 110 West 40th Street.

His features will not be exclusively of one brand, as it is Mr. Greene's idea that he would rather pick the specifically excellent features, instead of contracting to take all of this or that manufacturer's output, which would sometimes coerce him in releasing features of lesser merit.

The first release will be "Vampires of the Night" in five reels. As is natural to suppose, Mr. Greene has not put his weakest foot forward in beginning his campaign, and this feature is justifiably expected to indicate the quality of Greene's releases. Later releases will be "The Great Gold Robbery" in three parts, "Modern Mephisto" in six parts. These will be released at intervals of about two weeks. Mr. Greene will divide his time between New York and Boston. In his absence from New York City the office will be in charge of Miss E. Huber.

"THE PIRATES OF THE PLAINS."

Three Part Warner's Feature.

A feature of a distinctive type—made in the rugged country about Canon City, Colorado. It is a Western production without a single Indian to supply the local color. The atmosphere created by this virile photoplay is refreshingly new and the production owes much of its charm and power to the clever work of Josephine West and Joe Ryan, the cowboy who rides anything with four feet.

Scene from "The Pirates of the Plains" (Warner's Feature).

The simple justice of the west, as meted out by a jury of twelve stolid plainsmen, who are influenced by circumstantial evidence, is responsible for the daredevil ride of the heroine (Josephine West), to save her sweetheart from the hangman's noose. The scaffold scene in the jail yard is thrilling enough to make the most hardened fan hang onto his seat to await the outcome with fear and hope.

The piratical invasions of the Mexican horse-thieves provide unlimited thrills throughout the first and second reels and the third reel has its own scenes of excitement to carry the story to a happy finale.

NEW FEATURE EXCHANGE FOR SOUTH.

Early in March the Apex Feature Service will open an exchange in the Rhodes Bldg., Atlanta, Ga., to supply direct to southern exhibitors their many releases. Apex Features have long been known as a product that live exhibitors insist on—features that have the name, quality, punch and strong paper, their output consisting of all kinds of high class, big, spectacular productions such as "The Battle of Waterloo," "A Bargain with Satan," and those sensational thrillers as "The Black 13," "The Engine of Death," "The Black Snake" and others. In addition to all Apex releases, the Atlanta office will handle releases of the Cosmos, Itala, and Blache American Companies, giving it by far the largest number, best selected, and finest quality features of any exchange in the entire South. The "Apex Feature Service," the name this exchange will operate under, is to open with over twenty-five well selected features, and will continue to release the aforementioned features and others to be announced, three additional subjects every week, thus assuring exhibitors a regular feature service of a kind that will prove a big business booster, and give their house a standing that cannot be duplicated. The manager of the exchange will be Morris Levison, a capable young man of long experience in the regular and feature film service.

THE I. S. P. CO.

I. S. Plaut, who has just returned from Europe, brought with him two feature films. One is a thrilling detective story, entitled "Detective Finn of Scotland Yard," in three parts, and "King Charles," in four parts, a historical feature suggested by the book "Ovingdea Grange," by Harrison Ainsworth. The scenario was written by Mr. Low Warren, acting editor of the "Kinematograph Weekly." The I. S. P. Co.'s offices are in the Candler Building, Room 906. Philip A. Holman, formerly publicity manager of the Pilot Films Corporation, is handling the advertising, and says the I. S. P. Co. will shortly have more surprises for buyers.

MARY PICKFORD AS "TESS OF THE STORM COUNTRY."

The next Mary Pickford release of the Famous Players Film Company is scheduled for March 20. "Little Mary" will be presented in the famous story of a woman's heroism "Tess of the Storm Country," by Grace Miller White. The story of Tess, with her quaint philosophy of life, humorous and pathetic, is one of the most powerful character sketches ever written. Tess is an elemental type of womanhood, a primitive heart struggling with modern conditions, and the delicate tortures of civilization. The theme is full of uplift, and the dramatic situations often force a tear of which we need not be ashamed. Mary Pickford as Tess, the ragged little "squatter" girl, dirty but beautiful, rude, willful, saucy, but noble and self-sacrificing, renders a portrayal of inexhaustible fascination. As a photodrama "Tess of the Storm Country" will give its audiences a subject out of the beaten path, and numerous thrills mingled with the sweetest of human traits, compassion.

"Tess of the Storm Country" is the second production to be made at the Los Angeles studio of the Famous Players, under the direction of Edwin S. Porter.

MIDGAR FEATURES POPULAR.

Midgar Features announce that their next release is a four-reel detective story entitled "The Diamonds of Destiny or A Scented Clue." This picture was made by the Imperator Film Co., of Berlin, and the film is said to contain a number of exceptionally strong scenes and some particularly striking photographic effects.

Mr. G. Blake Garrison, president of Midgar Features, is very gratified with the demand for "Life's Temptations," and says that this picture has already been booked over the entire Poli Circuit, through Mr. Machat, of the Standard Feature Film Co., of Boston.

"THE CALL OF THE TRAUMEREI" (American).

A gorgeous three reel feature by the "Flying A" Company under Lorimer Johnston has been evolved on the basis of Schuman's "Traumerei." The action is immense and the interest is retained throughout the production.

Vivian Rich represents the Nymph of the words and Sydney Ayres is the subject destined to be guided by the sweet strains of the selection. The incidents of a rather turbulent career of a student of art in Paris are most vividly portrayed. March 9th is the release date.

ANILINE FILM TONING PROCESS.

The Berlin Aniline Works have worked out a process for toning motion picture films with Aniline colors, which process lends considerable leeway as to combination of toning and tinting of the film. The Berlin Aniline Works designate these colors as the "Agfa" toning colors. Full instructions together with shade card will be furnished to parties interested in taking up this process. Write the Berlin Aniline Works, 213 Water Street, New York, for information.

Famous Suffragettes—Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, Mrs. Jane Cooley, Inez Milholland and Mrs. Snyder with "Our Mutual Girl" Chapter 7, Released March 2.

"DISCORD AND HARMONY."

Gold Seal Three-Reel Drama, Released March 17.

There is an old saying to the effect that "one might as well have the game as the name." Whether that is good logic or not is for the individual himself to decide in every case. But there is another angle to the question; let society give a person the "name" and in time that person is apt to enjoy the game.

Here is a play, a Gold Seal three-reel play that, while possessing an absorbing love story and strong action, deals with the possibility of a man securing the game when the name has been given him. Put yourself in this man's place.

Scene from "Discord and Harmony" (Gold Seal).

For years you have worked to support a mother—and have loved a girl. That girl leaves you to marry someone you known is unworthy of her. Your mother dies; nursing your sorrow you go into the mountains in search of solitude. You fall in with a band of outlaws, only as a visitor. But word travels back to your friends that you are an active member. You become a marked man, shunned and ostracized. What would you be apt to do?

Allan Dwan, producer of such striking plays as "The Lie" and "Bloodhounds of the North," both Gold Seal features, is both the author and director of this piece. It is a Western drama with love, romance and adventure as its actuating motives.

"IN MIZZOURA" (All Star).

It is announced by the All Star Feature Corporation that the next release of that company will be an adaptation in moving pictures of Augustus Thomas' great rural play, "In Mizzoura," which enjoyed several successful seasons on Broadway as a theatrical production and later a similar success as a road attraction.

Burr McIntosh, the world-famed photographer, author, actor, war correspondent and publisher of the artistic Burr McIntosh monthly, is featured in the production and is to be seen in the role which he originally created, that of Jo Vernon, the village blacksmith.

In support of Mr. McIntosh are to be seen many faces familiar to theatergoers of the country. Raymond Bond is cast in the role of Jim Radburn, a part originally played by Nat C. Goodwin; Francesca Rotoli appears as Kate; Charlotte Lambert as Mrs. Vernon, "Ma"; Gwendolyn Piers as 'Lizbeth; William Conklin as Travers; H. D. Blakemore as Col. Bollinger, and others.

"In Mizzoura" will be a five-reel production, which it is freely predicted will take a prominent place among those releases already made by the All Star Feature Corporation.

FAMOUS PLAYERS PRODUCE "CLOTHES."

The Famous Players Film Company has now in course of production Grace George's sensational dramatic success "Clothes," written by Avery Hopwood and Channing Pollock, the play that startled metropolitan society. "Clothes," based on Carlyle's immortal line "Society is founded upon cloth," is a powerful contrast of love and desire, sham and sincerity. It is a true story in many respects, only too true to the life it depicts so vividly.

Olive Sherwood, a pretty girl, fond of finery, sighs over her quiet life in a mid-western city, and longs for the gayeties of fashionable New York society. At length fate gives her that for which her heart yearns, and she is introduced into the gilded circle to which her ambition had so long aspired. For a time she is petted and happy, but little by little the petty strife, envy and jealousy of the superficial world in which she lives overshadow her joys, and she begins to see that the glittering globe at her feet is a hollow one. Evil influences, of which she is unconscious, threaten her. Near the verge of destruction, the innocent and ignorant Olive, through a crucial episode that barely escapes tragedy, awakens to a realization of the snares and dangers that surround a soul wrapped in the pride of clothes. She believes her life is blasted forever, but going back to the little home she once despised, she finds there the love and happiness she had vainly sought in the world of sham and frivolity.

The film production of this celebrated society drama is mounted, to the minutest detail, with elaborate care and faithful adherence to the imposing dignity of the original stage presentation. Charlotte Ives portrays the role made famous by Grace George, supported by a notable cast, including House Peters, Edward Mackay, Minna Gale Haynes, Fred Webber, and the famous stage child, Mimi Yvonne.

Notes of the Trade

LILLIAN GISH will soon be seen interpreting one of the greatest roles in her varied career as an actress when the first Griffith Film, entitled, "The Battle of the Sexes," or "The Single Standard," by the noted author of Hagar Revelly, Daniel Carson Goodman, is presented upon the Mutual program.

Under the title of "Like Father, Like Son," Tom Ricketts, one of the directors of the "Flying A" staff, has completed a very fascinating drama. In it the theories of environment and heredity are depicted in a marked and convincing manner. Release date will be announced later.

THE first step toward establishing a social center at the boys' farm, Hudson, has been made by Superintendent Laird after Welfare Director Cooley, of Cleveland, approved Laird's plans for motion picture exhibitions. Admission will be charged to all except boy inmates of the farm.

According to the belief of F. E. Simmons, manager of the Dreamland Theater, Euclid avenue, Cleveland, newspaper advertising is just as essential to the moving picture house as it is to the legitimate theater. This was his suggestion in an address recently before the League of Motion Picture Exhibitors. Mr. Simmons' topics was, "Advertising—Does It Pay?" Mr. Simmons condemned the use of handbills and advocated the friendly relations between newspapers and the motion picture theater. This was the first of a series of papers to be read at the weekly meetings of the League. Mr. Simmons traced the growth of the motion picture business from the first store shows to the present time. He explained that the screeching phonograph in the theater front was the first method of attracting attention adopted by the theater managers. Ornamental fronts and myriad lights followed and next came the posters and banners.

Discriminating patrons of the moving picture are being compelled to take notice since the Columbia Amusement Company bought the Boulevard Theater, corner of Lorain avenue and West 99th street, Cleveland. Sam Bullock, general manager of the Columbia company, is in direct charge of the theater.

The second annual grand ball of The Moving Picture Association Local 160, I. A. T. S. E., Cleveland, was held at the Chamber of Commerce Hall Wednesday night, February 25.

"BUCKEYE."

INDIANA.

TROUBLE is brewing as a result of the plan of Mayor Bell, of Indianapolis, to have the moving picture charitable funds surrendered to the mayor or the committee appointed by him. J. M. Rhodes, president of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, and treasurer of the Citizens' Charity Organization, says the moving picture men of Indianapolis are willing to have an accountant from the mayor's office examine their books, but will not surrender their funds. Sixty out of seventy motion picture theater owners in Indianapolis are members of the Citizens' Charity Organization. The organization was organized and incorporated several years ago to handle contributions from the proceeds of Sunday performances in motion picture houses here. Mayor Bell says complaints have reached him that moving picture men have received letters that unless they contributed part of Sunday show proceeds to charity their names would be sent to the police superintendent. The mayor says there appears to be dissatisfaction in the manner in which funds have been distributed. If motion picture theaters do not contribute they may be closed Sundays. The mayor has just appointed a committee to receive and disburse voluntary contributions from exhibitors. The motion picture theater owners say they are willing to publish a weekly report showing receipts and expenditures. Mayor Bell refuses to accept the weekly contribution of $25 made regularly for years by the picture men for charitable purposes. Other meetings are scheduled for the near future at which efforts will be made to adjust the present troubles. Mayor Bell's committee is composed of well known business men. Mayor Bell recently took office.

Lyman H. Howe's moving pictures were shown at the Academy of Music, Rochester, March 3.

PORTLAND, ORE.

THE City Council of Astoria, Ore., is planning to enact an ordinance whereby all film shall be subject to be passed by a local board of censorship.

Portland is to have a new $100,000 photoplay house, to be called The National. The site located is at Stark and Park streets, and construction will begin April 1. Melvin G. Winstock is the promoter of the new theater, he having resigned from the Peoples' Amusement Company. The plans call for a seating capacity of 2,000 and is to be three stories in height with two balconies.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Peoples' Amusement Company held last week, the resignation of M. G. Winstock was accepted and the board was reorganized with the following officers in charge: Fred Rothchild, president; Max Hirsch, vice-president; D. Solis Cohen, secretary, and Ed. Schoenwald, treasurer. Two new members, C. A. Malarkey and M. Palley were added to the board. The company is rapidly disposing of its theaters outside of the city, and controls only three theaters in addition to those six now in their charge.

The Columbia Theater is putting on a number of special features in order to keep this house in lead, as there seems to be great competition to see which theater is the most popular.

Model moving picture programs by some Milwaukee photoplay houses and the support of this house by the Milwaukee Art Society were urged by Director Dudley Crafts Watson of the society. Mr. Dudley in his address upon "The Moving Picture and Art" denied that the moving picture would eventually crowd real art and drama off the stage of modern life. For his model picture show he suggested a program which would include a reel of natural history or geography, a piece of standard fiction and a snappy comedy. If this plan were carried out with a Milwaukee theater a daily matinee for children would be given at 5.30 o'clock, a second show for children and grown-ups at 6.30 and a night performance for older persons at 7.45. Different subjects would be permitted at the last performance, but be disapproved of children seeing any sex problem and overburdened love-story films. Admission of 2 or 3 cents for the children was suggested, with a dime as the minimum for the adults. "It is a sad fact that American theaters are the worst in the world," he is credited with saying, "although Milwaukee has two motion picture theaters where the ventilation and general cleanliness is better than that of any European theaters I have ever been in." Pursuing the thought that the photoplay is not detracting from the stage, he declared that "motion pictures create in the masses a desire for fine out-of-door scenery and for scientific productions." As a result the legitimate drama will be forced to forsake its worn-out love themes and go into what Mr. Watson considers the "more worthy field of histrionic presentation of war, hunting, conquests of air and sea, scientific feats and the more serious things of life."

The Odd Fellows of Jewell, Ia., contemplate the erection of an opera house.

The management of the Appleton Theater, at Appleton, Wis., has taken out insurance against dark nights by installing projecting apparatus and will give a ten-cent picture show at times when there are no other attractions.

Sufficient sums for the installation of motion picture apparatus in some of the school social centers are included in the estimates for the coming year submitted to the Detroit, Mich., Board of Education by Dr. Charles E. Chadsey, city superintendent of schools. Doctor Chadsey believes the social centers of the city are not yet ideal because the cultural features have been minimized and the recreational feature over-emphasized. If the plans of using the picture machine in social center work is successful he will ask a larger appropriation next year for their installation in the day schools. "The greatest development in the education today is through the eye," he said, "and the time is rapidly approaching when every public school in Detroit will have to have its moving picture equipment if it is to keep pace with the best educational methods. The finest results have been obtained in teaching geography and history with the aid of moving pictures. A most effective way of inspiring interest in the classics of literature is through showing the children pictorial representations with the aid of the moving picture machine."

It is said that the aims of the women include the closing of shows on Sunday. Preliminary work included visits to each theater for all the changes during a week and making notes about pictures to which objections could be raised.

J. M. Totten, of Superior, Wis., has purchased the Milo Theater, at Little Falls, Minn., from the Princess Theater Circuit Company.

Moving picture shows are being given in Spokane, Wash., under the auspices of the Sunday school of the First Methodist Church, Howard street and Third avenue. No admission is charged, but a silver offering is taken. Musical numbers supplement the educational and scenic pictures shown.

The Colonial Theater Company, of Sioux Falls, S. D., has been incorporated with capital stock of $25,000. The incorporators are Asher K. and Dora Pay and Emmet H. Craig.

Moving pictures, speeches and a grand ball were on the program at the formal opening of the Humboldt Theater, in Humboldt, S. D., February 18. Citizens of the town showed their appreciation of the enterprise of Proprietor Fred Wiese by taking 350 tickets at $2.50 each. A supper was served by the ladies' missionary society of the Congregational Church, and complimentary remarks were delivered by three editors and a minister.

A. Carl Reusse and George Rauenhorst, of Fulda, Minn., have purchased the Crystal Theater at that place from F. A. Christensen.

The Idle Hour Theater, at Veblen, S. D., has been sold to George W. Bedell, proprietor of the Waldorf Hotel.

George Fossen and Paul Metlie are now owners of the Dreamland Theater, at Starbuck, Minn.

A building is being remodeled at Gaylord, Minn., which will be the new home of the Hub City Amusement Company.

The old Superior Hardware Company building, at 1018 Tower avenue, Superior, Wis., is being remodeled for use as a motion picture theater.

Andrew Myler, city fire marshal of St. Paul, Minn., believes the fire risks in picture theaters so serious a problem that he has asked Mayor Keller, of St. Paul, to call a conference of state and city fire marshals, building inspectors and owners of motion picture and vaudeville theaters to discuss the problem. Better protection against fires recently was asked of Mayor Keller by a delegation representing the Trades and Labor Assembly, which urged the stationing of a fire marshal in each theater.

City officials of Minneapolis, Minn., suspected an attempt to "corner" motion picture theater sites when six applicants for licenses for theaters on Sixth avenue, N., were received by the council committee. Five of them were denied and Harry Ciplinsky was given a permit to operate a show at 1041 Sixth avenue, N. License Inspector Gray said a fictitious name was used by one applicant and there were two sets of applicants for two other locations.

A moving picture show will be operated at South Stillwater, Minn., by Nichols & Johnson.

F. A. Fellows has sold the Bijou Theater, at Aberdeen, S. D., to R. A. Booth.

The opera house at Wahpeton, N. D., has been leased by R. B. McMichael and Henry Schweitzer.

Thomas Vallancy has sold the Bijou Theater, at Dickinson, N. D., to Mrs. B. Leonberger.

The Doric Theater at Chisholm, Minn., has been taken over by F. F. Murray and C. Spraker.

Motion pictures of logging operations were shown at the American Theater, in Salt Lake City, Utah, for the benefit of delegates to the convention of the Western Retail Lumbermens' conference.

John Pasaza, of Hutchinson, Minn., has bought the Unique moving picture theater, at Zumbrota, Minn., from O. A. Ness.

Mrs. Victor Peterson and Miss Alpha Peterson, of St. Paul, have purchased the Ruby Theater, at Webster, S. D., from Walter Arthur.

G. R. Swanson, of Menomonie, Wis., has purchased the Grand Theater, at Lake City, Minn., from Al Grant.

Mme. Marie von Unschuld, court pianist for the Queen of Rumania, who appeared recently in concert in St. Paul, Minn., uses motion pictures in giving lessons in technical training. She recently had 1,600 feet of pictures made in Washington, D. C., illustrating the technical parts of the principles of Beethoven, Czerny, Liszt, Tausig, Rubinstein, Leschetizky and others. While the pictures are being shown on the screen Mme. von Unschuld talks and also plays at the piano.

W. B. Parnell has sold his interest in the moving picture theater at Cavalier, N. D., to James Long, who, with A. B. Sweet, will continue to operate it.

W. I. Tiffany, formerly of Dawson, Minn., is now operating a picture show at Clara City, Minn.

The Board of Education of Salt Lake City, Utah, has made an appropriation of $100 for the rental of films to be used by the high school students in the study of zoology, botany and geography. The school has owned a machine since last year. In appraising the value of the pictures for educational work the Salt Lake City school authorities place above the ease of demonstration, the interest created among the students.

The reels recently made for the National Association for the Deaf were shown in St. Paul and Minneapolis. The signs made by the characters in the pictures were interpreted to the hearing spectators by Miss Petra Faudram.

H. T. Nolan, general manager of the Swanson Film Company, of Denver, Col., was recently a visitor at Grand Junction, Col., where he has an interest in the Majestic Theater.

The Bijou Grand, of Walla Walla, Wash., aided the dentists of that city by showing their educational film at his house.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE H. B. B. Motion Picture Company has been incorporated here with a capital stock of $20,000, the directors being W. Blake, H. R. Brinck and F. H. Davis.

The American Theater on Market street, just above Seventh, will be opened within a few months as a moving picture house, having been leased by the De Long Amusement Company. This theater is one of the first legitimate houses to be opened in the downtown district following the great fire of 1906, but has been closed most of the time during the past two years. The playhouse will be remodeled and refurnished at an estimated cost of $75,000 and when opened again it will be known as the California. The seating capacity will approximate 2,000.

E. H. Emmick, president and general manager of the Union Film & Supply Company, was here recently from Los Angeles to spend a few days at the local office, which is in charge of William V. Wood. This concern occupies quarters in a handsome new building at 124 Golden Gate avenue.

Henry Henriouile, formerly with the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., is now with the California Film Exchange, Inc., filling a position made vacant by the recent resignation of David Bershan, who is now connected with the Universal Film Mfg. Co.

At the Policemen's Ball, held on the evening of February 21, a moving picture was shown in which Mayor Rolph, four police commissioners, Chief of Police D. A. White, and members of the Board of Supervisors took prominent roles. The picture showed a battle between a policeman and three thugs, with the leading role filled by Policeman W. F. Krueger, who recently engaged in a real gun battle with yeggmen. The reel is to be sold on the grounds of the theaters and the royalties will be turned over to the Widows' and Orphans' fund.

Miles Bros., who have taken most of the moving pictures that have been made of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition activities, sent a cameraman on the recent excursion made by the exposition officials and leading business men of the city to Los Angeles. Moving pictures were taken on the trip down the coast and at the arrival of the delegation in the southern city. The pictures were shown the day to a big gathering of guests in the evening.

M. Calmy [illegible] of the Pilm Exchange, Inc., is making a [illegible] through the interior of the state, where he is securing a good volume of business.

At a recent meeting of the Exhibitors' League of San Francisco the proposition was discussed at some length of limiting the length of the programs of 10 cent and 20 cent houses. At least two exhibitors have tentatively agreed to limit their programs to six reels, except in case of a single subject, and it is likely that others will agree to this.

The Appleton Investment Company is erecting a splendid theater building at Watsonville, Cal., which when completed, will be operated by Turner & Dahnken as a part of the chain of photoplay theaters conducted by them. The building will be of first-class construction and will cost about $50,000. The seating capacity will be about 1,000.

The Keenograph Company, which has been erecting studio buildings on its property at Fairfax, Cal., for some time, is now ready to turn out films.

Contracts have been let for the erection of a moving picture theater at Martinez, Cal., by J. A. Kelly, of that place.

The It Theater, at Berkeley, Cal., is to be opened shortly by A. Mathewson. This moving picture house has been closed for some time.

The Star Theater has been reopened at Ukiah, Cal., by McDonald & Wilson and a specialty is now being made of high-grade feature films.

A new theater will be opened shortly at San Jose, Cal., by James Beaty.

The Isis Theater has been opened at Willows, Cal., by G. Garnett. This playhouse was formerly known as the U-go, but had been closed for some time.

The Majestic Theater, at Maricopa, one of the most thriving cities in the California oil fields, is now being conducted by J. A. Spencer.

The city censor of Sacramento, Cal., which in the past has been accepting the verdict of censorship boards in Chicago and Eastern cities in regard to the exhibition of films, has been asked to accept the ruling of the San Francisco board of censorship in the future. Films that have passed the board here have in some cases been condemned in other places, and vice versa and considerable confusion has resulted of late when exhibitors in the Capitol City have not been allowed to show films that have been shown at San Francisco.

The Bell Theater is now in a new location at Livermore, Cal., and a better business is already being done.

L. R. Lewis is preparing to open a new moving picture theater at Willitts, Cal.

The Columbia Theater at Santa Rosa, Cal., formerly given over to road shows, is now a moving picture house.

The Oakland Photo Theater, Oakland, Cal., is being renovated and re-decorated throughout and a heating and ventilating system installed. The operating room is being moved from the main floor to the balcony in order to make more room for 20-cent seats.

The Sequoia Theater, Sacramento, Cal., recently showed moving pictures of the steamer "Grace Dollar" docking at that city. This was the first ocean-going steamship to touch at that city in fifty years. A splendid new orchestrion has just been installed in this theater.

Arthur Payne, of Menlo Park, Cal., is making a trip through the northern part of the state to secure moving pictures of the big game in that section.

Members of the moving picture operators', the bill posters', and the musicians' organizations of San Francisco, Oakland, San Jose and Stockton were guests of the Affiliated Theatrical Employees of Sacramento on February 18. The trip from San Francisco was made in a special car.

The Sacramento Valley Panama-Pacific International Exposition committee has engaged H. J. McCurry, of Sacramento, to take moving pictures of valley scenes to be exhibited at the San Francisco world's fair in 1915.

Matt M. Lewis has applied to the Board of Police Commissioners of San Francisco for a permit to exhibit moving pictures at Taylor and Eddy streets, and Charles W. Goodwin has applied for a permit to conduct a picture theater at 237 Church street.

The Peerless Theater Company has been incorporated at Spokane, Wash., by O. E. Shomber, W. A. Adair, Herbert Vierich, Lester P. Edge and L. F. Reinhard, with a capital stock of $100,000.

CHURCH.

ILLINOIS.

IT is reported that negotiations have been under way at Lewistown for the sale of the Princess Theater, one of the local moving picture houses, to the Misses Meek.

C. J. Grim, of Gibson City, has opened a moving picture show at Elliott.

Mr. and Mrs. William Boston, well known in the vaudeville field, are said to be contemplating opening a moving picture and vaudeville house in Sterling.

Mrs. Peter Pinkelmann is the manager of the new Family Theater, which has been opened at 1717 Broadway in Quincy. The house was built for Pinkelmann, who has been in the picture business in Quincy for some time and was presented by him to his wife. A feature of the new house is an Empress electric piano with bell and orchestra attachments.

Manager W. N. Powell, of the Colonial Theater at Rock Island, recently gave a benefit performance for the Central Athletic Club of that city.

Manager Lorin Bennett, of the moving picture show at Atlanta, has installed a new electric piano player. This music will be supplemented by that of G. Longworth, trap drummer.

The change in the ownership of the Grand Opera House at Jacksonville, which now is controlled by Hopper & Hoffman, has resulted in the acceptance by K. G. Boyd, of New York City, of the managership. Boyd has been in advance of a number of well-rated road shows and is especially qualified to take care of the theatrical attractions. Part of the time will be given over to vaudeville and pictures.

The opera house at Mt. Carroll has been leased by George Wales, of Lanark, for the coming year. A number of changes will be made in the house, but Frank Spearman will continue as local manager.

G. A. Urban, a business man of Quincy, has purchased a site on Sixth Street in that city and his plans for a building may include a new theater.

Boy Scouts of Galesburg sponsored a moving picture entertainment given recently in the Third Chapel in that city. One of the churches which owns projecting apparatus loaned the needed machine.

Editor Walter A. Townsend, of the Springfield Record, thinks it is the injection of politics into sermons and not the picture show that is detracting from the Sunday night attendance at the churches. He recently asked two ministers of different denominations the reason for the constantly decreasing crowds. The answer was the same: "The moving picture show." "Yet surely the church of the Living God, at all times and at all places should have a message for the masses—a message of comfort and peace and inspiration—a message so sublime and so essential to humanity that no picture show or other form of entertainment could detract attention therefrom," asserts the editor. To the intrusion of the secular and vitriolic discussion of public problems and lack of spiritual help he attributed the vacant seats and not to the photoplay. "More religion in our politics and less politics in our religion" he pleads.

The women of the Choral Club sold bakery goods, and a four-reel show was run for their benefit by Manager Hatcher of the Photoplay Theater at Elmwood.

The stage of the Star Theater in Evanston recently was used for a pulpit. The editor of the Evanston News remarks: "The motion picture has already invaded the church and has been welcomed there. By such combinations do we achieve a greater popular attraction in the church and a raising of the tone of the moving picture theaters."

The American Theater in East St. Louis again has been re-opened. This time it is under the management of George Dissinger, who has been manager for a clothing firm in that city. He will conduct it as a five-cent moving picture house.

Former business on "The Battle of Gettysburg" was so good at the Colonials in Galesburg that Manager Schroeder had it in again and did a big business.

The Kenilworth Club of Kenilworth is using moving pictures for its entertainments this winter, and the directors are thinking seriously of adding a machine to the properties of the organization.

The Belasco Theater Company, which owns a moving picture theater in Quincy, has filed its articles of incorporation with the recorder of Adams County. The capital stock is $2,100, which is held by W. A. Schwindeler, Herman Nelson and William Sohm.

The management of the Majestic Theater at Lockport has been assumed by D. M. Hughes, a jeweler of that city, who will conduct it for H. A. Fleckeles of Chicago.

Contract has been let by H. E. Winters, of Davenport, for a new motion picture theater to be erected on Fifteenth Street in Moline. It is expected to open some time in the spring.

The American Theater in Moline has been having trouble with the labor unions on account of the interior decorations which the labor organization says was done by men without cards. As a result the painters' union recommended to the other organizations that the American be added to the "We won't patronize" list.

Young debaters of Galesburg before a literary society of the high school turned from the standby subjects of capital punishment and woman's suffrage to thresh out the more important and local issue of: "Resolved, That moving picture shows in Galesburg should be kept open on Sunday." The affirmative side won.

D. M. Hughes, the new manager of the Majestic at Lockport, seems to be taking time by the forelock by inviting the ministers and school teachers of the city to act as censors for the attractions he presents. He secured Rev. Walter MacPherson, of Joliet, to deliver a lecture at the same time he showed "Absinthe," an Imp feature, on what he featured as Temperance night. He has announced that if special films of moral and of educational value are desired by the clergymen or the school men to supplement their own work he will be glad to secure them.

Kincaid, the interesting boom mining and power plant town which has sprung up almost overnight near Springfield, already glories in a new moving picture show. C. Mullen, of Taylorville, is the man who followed close upon the heels of the necessary tradesman and secured a location in the new Bulpitt Hall. He opened with a free show.

A new moving picture show has been opened at Emden by Cola Rosenrink.

Although the new Peru Theater in Peru opened with a musical sketch, the bookings are not given over entirely to vaudeville. The second night bill was made up of feature pictures, and the photoplay will have a great share in the operation of the house. The pretty little theater, which is operated by Forrest Fletcher, has a seating capacity of about 500.

A decidedly suspicious rumor was floated in the vicinity of Rock Island and Moline to the effect that the same persons who were engaged in a prohibition campaign had determined to close the pool rooms and theaters of not only those two large cities, but of East Moline, Silvis and Watertown. The movement was aimed more especially at the legitimate and vaudeville houses and not at the moving picture theaters, so the story ran. While it probably is true that a great many advocates of saloonless towns will also be found radical on the Sunday picture show proposition, it is notable that the saloon man is seldom a champion of the picture show; it hurts his business. It is only when a temperance wave sweeps over his community that he welcomes the photoplay manager as a fellow-martyr. The sad part is that many a picture manager has fallen for the "They'll-be-shutting-you-up-next" game and allied himself with the wrong crowd instead of remaining neutral.

The blizzard which struck Illinois the last week in February blew away all business for several nights. Even if the people had ventured out there was little attraction for them. Traffic was tied up and film changes were impossible. For affecting the picture shows all over the state it was the worst in the history of photoplay managers.

"Quo Vadis?" on its return engagement to the Majestic Theater at Peoria received added business because of the endorsement of Archbishop Spalding, of the Roman Catholic Church, who had seen the films on their first visit. They were the first moving pictures ever witnessed by the noted churchman and, in addition to their educational possibilities, the magnitude of the filming enterprise proved astonishing to him.

Dr. George F. Allen, of Aurora, whose illustrated articles on eyes have been published in scientific papers all over the world, thought it worth while recently to ridicule the "moving picture eye" theory before the Y. M. C. A. of that city. "Modern moving pictures do not injure the eye," he declared. "The first ones did because they were so irregular. The perfection of the pictures, however, now makes them no longer dangerous."

Mrs. A. M. Osborne has given to Monmouth the fourth picture show, the Alamo, on East First Avenue. A number of attractive touches make it a distinctive house.

Some Illinois communities are taking exceptions to the methods used by the makers of industrial or town-boosting reels. It is declared that there is a great deal of misrepresentation upon part of the agents of the film company. A merchant who is asked to pay a part of the cost of bringing in the cameraman is told that the picture will be shown all over the country. Often he is told it will become a part of one of the well-known weeklies and sometimes the name or slogan of the prominent weeklies are used freely. While it is true that nearly every little city has some feature that does find its way through the industrial companies into the big weeklies, there is a tendency to exaggerate upon the circulation of the purely advertising film. The merchant may profit merely from the exhibition of the film in a local house and in the other nearby towns, but exhibitors who endorse industrial companies should see that their fellow-townsmen are not the victims of misrepresentation.

NEW ENGLAND.

GEORGE I. APPLEBY, formerly assistant manager of Mutual's Boston office, has been promoted to the position of manager of the Mutual's branch office at Waterville, Me.

Harry F. Campbell, treasurer and general manager of Warner's Features of Massachusetts, announces that he will hold a "run-off" of the Warner Features each Monday at 3 p. m. at his office 209 Pleasant street, Boston. Mr. Campbell makes this innovation in the interests of exhibitors desiring to personally view films before booking them. The city of Boston has made arrangements with Mr. Campbell to use Warner Features in Charlestown and East Boston schools. "Sleeping Beauty," "The Lady of the Lake" and other high-class Warner pictures have been chosen for the pupils of schools in Greater Boston.

The Fitchburg, Mass., Opera House has changed its policy and has contracted for the full Universal program from General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston. The Opera House had been exploiting stock company attractions.

L. S. Morse reports that his theater at Jeffersonville, Vt., is doing very well indeed. Mr. Morse is a well known lumber merchant, and his employees desired some amusement, which was promptly provided. A new Power's Cameragraph machine was installed last week.

Lewis Selznick, of the World Film Corporation, was in Boston on February 28, looking over the ground with Fred B. Murphy, manager of the Boston office. Mr. Selznick was more than pleased with Mr. Murphy's progress to date. The Boston office of this corporation will shortly be moved downtown, in order to secure more space. The new offices, so Manager Murphy states, will have all facilities, including an exhibition room.

Messrs. Toomey and Demara have closed their Star Theater at Lawrence, Mass., which will reopen shortly. The various theaters owned by this progressive firm are, as usual, doing a mighty encouraging business.

The Scenic Theater, Waltham, Mass., is now being handled by Arthur Burke, who succeeds Manager Gerstle, who left the Scenic to "pilot" a new theater at Newark, N. J.

Samuel Grant, of Grant and Campbell, has made a change in the film service of the theaters controlled by this firm, and Universal pictures are now being projected at the Olympia, Cambridge, Princess, Marlboro; Dreamland, Lynn; and the Plaza, Salem. All these houses regularly use the Warner Feature program, and this part of the service remains just as before.

The Aldermanic chamber at City Hall, Boston, was crowded this week, when Mayor Curley gave a public interview and hearing to the remonstrants in the matter of the moving picture theater that Abraham Kubinsky plans to build, and for which he has asked a license. The site is at the corner of Blue Hill avenue and Elmo street, Roxbury. A great majority of those present were women who live in this section, who are opposed to a theater. The remonstrants were represented by Parker D. Morris, and the petitioner by Judge Edward J. Logan. Rev. Patrick J. Supple, pastor of St. John's Church, Blue Hill avenue; Rev. Charles L. Page, of the Dudley Street Baptist Church; Rev. F. A. Cunningham, of St. Leo's Church; and Judge M. J. Sullivan entered their protests on the ground that it is a residential district, declaring that a theater would be too much of an attraction for young people. These people also pointed out that the idea of putting a theater there was for the purpose of taking advantage of the crowds that visit Franklin Park. Judge Logan stated that his client proposed to put up a building that would cost from $150,000 to $170,000, and was to be conducted as a first class vaudeville and motion picture house. The mayor announced that he would take the matter under advisement and give his decision shortly.

Mayor Curley, of Boston, also gave a public hearing this week on the petition of Charles J. Gorman for a license to run a Sunday night moving picture show in the Roslindale Theater, Roslindale, Mass. Rev. F. L. Carr conducted the hearing for the remonstrants, and J. M. Graham acted as representative of the petitioners. Mrs. Fred W. McArdle, speaking for the Roslindale Community Club, the membership of which is drawn from all the churches and societies in that section, protested against Sunday night shows "in a community noted for its quiet and natural attractiveness, its pure air and good schools," as Mrs. McArdle naively stated. It was also declared that the performance was far from being a "sacred concert," and particular objection was made to the character of the vaudeville, which was called "coarse and cheap." Manager Gorman pointed out that all performances were approved by the state police, and that all his films were passed by the National Board of Censorship. Mr. Gorman offered to cut out the vaudeville, and to give the use of his theater to charity any day of the week. Many of these "uplift" societies, so-called, also added objections, and Mayor Curley has the matter under advisement.

Exhibitors of Boston were fearful that such a condition as related above would arise, as the result of Mayor Curley's determination to give all theaters a Sunday license, irrespective of location. Under Mayor Fitzgerald, theaters in fussy residential districts were not granted Sunday licenses, which eliminated such a condition as now exists in Roslindale.

Councilman William H. Woods has secured a license for his motion picture theater at Brighton, Mass., a feat which he was unable to perform while Mr. John F. Fitzgerald was mayor of Boston, due to objections of the clergy and others.

Eclectic productions are to have a Boston office, as headquarters for the New England trade. Arrangements were made this week for offices, etc.

At the request of Inspector Atkinson, of the Massachusetts State Police, the members of the Operators' Union, Boston Local 182, were urged to co-operate with the department in enforcing the new ruling regarding the placing of plate glass before all booth apertures, thus preventing outside odors from entering the booth. At the present time, it is compulsory to keep the ventilating fan, which is placed in the booth in order to draw off smoke in event of a fire going continually. In most instances the booths in this state are situated as near the ceiling as possible, and this, combined with the action of the fan, means that all germs, odors and microbes which are floating around the auditorium are drawn into the booth, and the operator, who must stand in front of the "look-out hole" is subjected to these germs and dust.

Business Agent Franke, of the Boston Local Operators' Union, reports that arrangements for a better system of delivering films to the wagon operated by the General's Boston offices, have been made. Mr. Franke, of the Local, is chairman of the Legislative Committee, and has appeared at the State House on a number of bills which affect this industry, among which are: Bill regarding use of the Cinematograph (which is the operator's own measure); Censorship bill, Use of cinematograph by militia; Admitting children to picture shows, that school organizations may change admission fees to exhibitors, and several minor measures.

Mayor John A. Dennison, of Springfield, Mass., issued an edict on February 24, notifying the managers of twenty-one theaters—mostly moving picture houses—in the city that we would not grant any licenses for Sunday shows after April 26. The mayor claims that the theaters have not conducted their performances in accordance with the spirit of the law, which requires that the entertainments shall be in keeping with the character of the day. The chief opponents of Sunday shows were members of the Springfield Ministers' Association, which has conducted an aggressive campaign against opening the playhouses for shows on the Lord's Day. In Worcester, Mass., things are in a similar condition, due to the activity of the local clergy, and the exhibitors' lack of organization.

The rights for New England to the Canadian Bioscope Company's production of Longfellow's "Evangeline" in motion pictures, have been purchased by Joseph P. Dumas, of the Colonial Building, Boston. Arrangements are being made for the exhibition of this five-part feature all over New England. Professor Neville will lecture on "Evangeline."

The Great Eastern Amusement Company, of Fall River, Mass., has incorporated for $50,000, with John L. Shea, Charles L. Benson and Walter L. Bigelow as the promoters.

The Scenic Realty Company is a new Boston incorporation. William D. Bradstreet and Wilfred H. Smart are the officers. The company incorporated for $50,000. Mr. Bradstreet is well known in New England as the original "Scenic Temple" man.

All differences with theatrical managers have been satisfactorily adjusted, it was reported at the meeting of the Theatrical Stage Employees' Union, Boston local, held this week.

At Providence, R. I., the Arcadia Amusement Company has been formed as a $10,000 concern. John H. Dyer, Harry E. McCausland and Edward M. Fay are the officers.

Manager Nathan Brown, of the busy Broadway Theater, Everett, Mass., has enlarged his picture program from four to six reels a change. Mr. Brown is one of the original Universal exhibitors, and when he decided to augment his program, decided to add a two-part Universal feature to his show. The Broadway gives several good vaudeville acts also, and plays to capacity audiences.

On Washington's Birthday, the inmates of the State Prison, Boston, were treated to a long photoplay program, which pleased the audience immensely.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts is now incorporated. Ernest H. Horstmann, John F. Patten, and Herman A. Sivolvos did the incorporating, which was for $5,000. Charters will be sent to all members of the league, who are requested to post them—prominently—in their theaters.

To make the Cambridge, Mass., schools public, by opening them nights for moving picture shows, is the present idea of several members of the Cambridge School Association, who have talked with Edward Ordway, a director of the People's Institute, New York.

Holyoke is another Massachusetts city where the question of Sunday night shows is being seriously agitated. It is possible that this is due to the attitude of Springfield on this matter, which city is adjacent to Holyoke. The "wise men" of Holyoke are busy with all kinds of regulations for the Sunday night shows, and, of course, the local clergy are actively engaged in denouncing these entertainments. Some of the local newspapers, however, come out in favor of Sunday moving picture shows, reasoning that the picture has done much to combat intemperance in Holyoke.

A new photoplay and vaudeville theater has been opened in Keene, N. H., which is using General Film service. This house seats 1200, and will go on the daily change policy.

The Daukantas Theater, Montello, Mass., reports good trade, with the Mutual program as the main attraction.

F. W. Swett, representative of the Nicholas Power Company, has now entirely recovered from a serious operation that he underwent at Boston some six weeks back. Mr. Swett is again up and doing, which is a great source of satisfaction to his many friends hereabouts.

John R. Patten, manager of Bates Opera House, Attleboro, Mass., is finding business very good, Mr. Patten is using General Film service and some Famous Players' productions, and also has a very fine eight-piece lady orchestra. Although competition is keen in Attleboro, Mr. Patten does a real capacity trade, and at the same time holds down the "job" of treasurer of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts.

SUCCESS

can only be obtained by satisfying the public's demand. You, Mr. Exhibitor, as a man of experience know that the public is critical and insists on THE BEST.

Simplex

success is due entirely to PUBLIC APPROVAL, and the practical demonstration of this is:

SIMPLEX sales have far more than doubled within a year.
SIMPLEX factory floor space has been trebled within a year.
SIMPLEX increased business has made necessary an all-night shift.

Facts such as the above are strong proofs of our success; they amply justify the term

KALEM.

THE COLLEEN BAWN (Special—3 parts—Mar. 16).—Facing the prospect of losing the vast Cregan estate which is heavily mortgaged, Mrs. Cregan plans to have her son, Hardress, marry Anne Chute, his wealthy cousin. Hardress, however, secretly marries Eily O'Connor, "The Colleen Bawn." Mrs. Cregan discovers that Hardress has married a low born girl. Danny Man, a half-witted cripple, senses the situation. Encouraged by Mrs. Cregan, he plans to put Eily out of the way. Danny decoys the Colleen to a rock out in the lake and attempts to drown her. In the darkness, he is mistaken for an otter and shot by Myles na Coppaleen. When Myles goes to retrieve his game, he comes upon the unconscious Colleen.

Desperately wounded, Danny manages to crawl home. Ten days later, he confesses that he has killed Eily, to Father Tom, the parish priest. Corrigan overhears the confession. The man holds the mortgage to the Cregan estate. He determines to cause Hardress's arrest. Anne Chute loves Kyrle Daly, but is led to believe him mixed up in an affair with Eily. Mrs. Cregan urges Hardress to marry Anne. Unaware of his mother's part in the Colleen's disappearance, and believing himself free, Hardress finally consents. To punish Kyrle, Anne consents to be Hardress's wife.

The wedding is about to take place, when soldiers enter and endeavor to place Hardress under arrest. In the midst of the confusion, Father Tom enters with the Colleen. Overwhelmed with joy upon seeing his wife, whom he had thought dead, Hardress seizes her in his arms. Anne learns that Kyrle is innocent of wrongdoing and marries him. Bowing her head to the inevitable, Mrs. Cregan gives Hardress and the Colleen her blessing.

THE AWARD OF JUSTICE (Special—2 parts—Mar. 18).—Horace Clark, a young evangelist, first thrashes and then reforms Tim Downs, a drunkard and a gangster. Horace wins the gratitude of Tim and his wife, when he saves their children from death. The gang, angry at having lost its leader, plans to waylay the evangelist. Horace is too much for the holdup men, however. In the battle, one of their number is slain with his own knife.

Horace is arrested and tried for murder. Owing to the perjured testimony of "The Rat," one of the band, the evangelist is sentenced to prison for life, despite the efforts of his brother, Arthur, a lawyer, in his behalf. Later, Horace, aided by Tim and his wife, escapes from jail and strikes for the mountains. Horace is rescued from starvation by Hester and her father, Hale, a mountaineer. The evangelist makes his home with them. He learns that the mountaineer is a moonshiner and gradually gets him to give up his illicit business. Hale, in destroying his still, accidently starts a fire and is burned to death.

Years pass. Horace has married Hester and is happy and content as a farmer. "The Rat," now a prominent politician, comes upon Horace while hunting in the mountains. He recognizes the evangelist, and determines to send him back to prison. It happens that Arthur is now the local Justice of the Peace. He listens to "The Rat's" story. Declaring that he knew Horace, Arthur, without revealing the fact that the man is his brother, informs "The Rat" that he will accompany him to the mountains for the purpose of identifying the man.

The following day the brothers face each other. Arthur, gazing steadily upon Horace, tells "The Rat" that the mountaineer is not the escaped prisoner. Baffled, "The Rat" apologizes and withdraws. Clasping Horace by the hand, Arthur turns and hastens from the house.

THE FAMILY SKELETON (Mar. 20).—Flo marries John, a fat man. All is bliss, until the bride tries to learn her hubby's occupation. John's silence, and later a note, presumably from his employer, cautioning him against flirting, excite Flo's curiosity. The bride follows her husband one morning and sees him enter a dime museum. Believing him to be flirting with one of the attractions, she follows. John, who is disguised as the fat "lady" of the show, is terror-stricken when Flo enters. He recovers his courage when she fails to recognize him. John, in the role of the fat "lady," flirts with every man in the place, to the intense jealousy of the female sword swallower. Later, the two get into a fight. The female sword swallower grabs at John's hair. Off comes his wig. Flo is petrified to see in the freak, her husband. The manager of the show discharges John. He tremblingly appr[illegible] that she will no longer love him. Flo, relieved to learn that her suspicions are [illegible] John in her arms. Although facing the prospect of looking for another job, John, delighted to learn that Flo's love is unchanged, leaves the dime museum in triumph.

CYPRESS LOGGING IN FLORIDA (Mar. 20).—The logger's occupation has been the inspiration for innumerable tales of adventure. In this feature, showing cypress logging in the swamps of Florida, it is revealed as an occupation that demands a high degree of strength and skill of the men engaged in it. The operation of converting cypress, known as the "wood eternal," into lumber, commences six months before the tree is actually felled. "Timber lookers" locate the trees and girdle them in order that the sap dry, thus killing the trees. This is necessary so that the logs when sent down the river, may float. Succeeding scenes show how the trees are felled and sent to the mill. Here they are converted into shingles, lathes, etc.

HIS INDIAN NEMESIS (Mar. 21).—Grey Hawk comes upon Bud Mannon in the enclosure at Fort Lee. He kills the man after a desperate knife duel. In giving his reason for the slaying, he tells Col. Hansen this story: "He wronged me and mine years ago, and I swore to slay him. I was a young brave of the Shawnee tribe. He, Mannon, an outcast, driven from his people.

"The chief of my tribe and I came upon him hiding in the underbrush. Although there was peace between his people and mine, he wantonly slew my chief and fled. I pursued him. We fought with our knives until I was left for dead. Settlers found me and brought me back to health. I vowed to kill my treacherous foe. But when I returned to my people, I found that he had become one of them and had turned their heads with strong drink. Even as I came, he was urging them to massacre his people—my friends.

"When I protested, they mocked me for a woman and bound me lest I give the white people warning. Later, they made the attack and massacred the settlers—slew them all but two, whom they brought back for torture. That night, Morning Dew, my squaw, cut my bonds and I aided my friends to escape. But Mannon saw us flee. Seizing his rifle, he shot at us—and killed Morning Dew. Fearing the wrath of my people, the coward fled. Over the body of my beloved, I swore to search for her slayer until I had wiped out my wrongs.

"Many moons passed until my head whitened like the snow and I feared that the Great Manitou had willed that my foe escape. But today my search came to an end. In this fort I found Mannon. At the sight of me, fear entered his heart, while I felt once more in my withered muscles the strength of my youth. Again we fought with our knives and I slew him in fair combat. Do with me as the white man's law requires. I am content."

VITAGRAPH.

AUNTIE (Mar. 16).—In a rather shabby tenement room lives Meg, a young orphan girl; across the hall lives Auntie Bruce, and George, her young nephew. Meg and George are sweethearts. He is employer in a large foundry and she in the hosiery and glove department of a large store. One day, Mr. Rich, the owner of the store, admiringly watches Meg at work. He selects a pair of elaborate hose, and asks her to accept them. She does so rather timidly. To deceive her fellow-employees she sends them to Auntie Bruce. Auntie, on opening the package, is surprised and rather shocked, but decides it was simply a mistake. When Meg returns, she explains in an artless manner how she got them. Auntie becomes very thoughtful. She invites Meg to supper with her and George. He brings home some violets to Meg, but she, with her mind full of her afternoon's experience, takes them rather indifferently.

Later, she and George go for a walk. He points to a small house for sale and talks to her of "a little home of their own." She, however, tells him she wants to marry a rich man and sees a vision of herself in fine clothes, etc. Poor George is disheartened. Meg, in her room, takes a childish delight in admiring the stockings. The next day Auntie goes to see Mr. Rich and in a gentle manner tells him what the effect of his gift has had on Meg. Realizing his mistake, he goes to Meg's counter, takes down some gloves and in a fatherly and impersonal manner, says, "Please add these to your trousseau, too, when you marry the young man who loves you." She is taken aback, her foolish dream of wealth rudely shattered.

Auntie and Mr. Rich soon become friends and she accepts his invitation to lunch. Meg, at home, tenderly puts George's violets in a cup of water. George sees her, and they are soon in each other's arms. At the restaurant, Mr. Rich buys some violets and gracefully presents them to Auntie as a proof of his esteem and admiration.

THE PRICE OF VANITY (Special—2 parts—Mar. 17).—Young, pretty and fond of dress, Rhoda Mills, brought up in moderate circumstances, prefers young Dick Arnold, just from college, to Gilman Beverly, a wealthy, middle-aged gentleman and a friend of her father's. Mr. Beverly is unselfishly devoted to Rhoda and after finding she loves Dick, withdraws in favor of the young man. He contributes a handsome check as a wedding present, and proves himself a faithful friend to the young people. All goes well, until one evening Dick is unable to go with them to the opera, and she and Beverly go alone. Dick returns home from business tired and irritable, and when Rhoda and Mr. Beverly arrive, he becomes suspicious of their friend. The next day Dick, arriving home early, finds Mr. Beverly there and orders his wife to put a stop to his visits. He puts on his hat and coat, and goes out in a rage. Mr. Beverly sees something is wrong and persuades Rhoda to tell him. Stunned and hurt, he immediately goes out, leaving Rhoda weeping.

Two years pass and Rhoda becomes tired of genteel poverty. One of her friends invites Dick and her to a reception at the St. Regis and Rhoda realizes she has no clothes suitable for the occasion. Dick gives her some of the rent money, making it up later on by night work. Unable to find anything suitable for the amount she has, in a moment of temptation, at the solicitation of a chum, she runs a bill at a fashionable dressmaker's. Later, when the dressmaker begins to press her for payments, she desperately pawns some of her jewelry, and finally becomes ill through worry. Dick has become intensely jealous of Beverly, who comes to visit Rhoda in her illness. Mad with jealous rage, he denounces her and Beverly, and orders her from the house. She meets Mr. Beverly and tells him all her troubles. He tries to comfort her and Dick sees Rhoda in his arms. Dick now determines to commit suicide, but is prevented by Rhoda and Beverly, and, after explanations, Rhoda says, "I have paid the price of vanity." After Beverly and Dick shake hands as friends once more, he goes out, leaving the two young people to their happiness.

THE GHOSTS (Mar. 18).—Four young men and three girls come to spend the week-end at the country estate of Mr. Harvey, to visit his daughter, Phoebe. That evening, after dancing, they build a bonfire on the beach and ghost stories are told by Jim, Phoebe's sweetheart. He tells them so realistically that the girls are frightened away from the fire, and run back to the house. The girls tell Mr. Harvey of their scare, and he, entering into the spirit of the fun, tells them he will show Jim a real ghost. When the boys arrive, he takes them all to a chamber of the old mansion, which is supposed to be haunted by the ghost of an old soldier, and dares Jim to sleep there all night. Jim boastfully takes the dare. Unknown to them all, Jim is a somnambulist. That night he walks in his sleep down to the beach, and in a lonely spot, carefully buries his clothes in the sand.

The next day, neither he nor anyone else can find the clothes, and Jim tells them of an awful vision of a ghost that appeared to him during the night and took away his clothes. They all laugh at him, but Phoebe is disgusted. All the next day Jim, who is deeply in love, tries to propose to Phoebe, but she declares she will not listen until he explains away the ghost affair. The other boys, to help Jim solve the mystery, sit up until 12 o'clock the following night to see the ghost walk; the girls, in their room, also staying awake until the witching hour. Promptly at midnight, to the great amazement of the boys, Jim repeats his performance of the night before. The boys call the girls and all follow Jim, awakening him just as he starts to dig in the sand. He is completely dazed and bewildered. They bring to light his buried clothes and all enjoy a good hearty laugh at poor Jim's expense. Phoebe, however, now that the matter is explained, speaks soothingly to him, and walks back with him along the moonlit shore. Jim fervidly proposes and Phoebe affectionately and readily answers "Yes."

THE IDLER (Mar. 19).—A poor mother of five children offers the youngest for adoption. The newspapers hear of it and publish it as an unusual case. Mrs. Upton reads the article. She and her husband are wealthy and childless, and she persuades her husband to go with her to see the child. They find the tenement where Mrs. O'Flynn lives. The mother tells them Victor's father was a good man, not dissipated, but inclined to idleness. Mrs. Upton is immediately charmed with the child and after arrangements are made, Mrs. O'Flynn parts tearfully with it. Jim O'Flynn, in the meantime, returns home, learns his youngest child has been adopted, takes what little money the poor woman has left and departs in an ugly mood.

Victor is showered with every attention and soon becomes a spoiled child. Fifteen years later, his foster-father receives notice that his son failed to pass his college examinations. Victor is sent home. Mr. Upton gives him a position in his office. He displays some of the characteristics of his father. He then puts Victor to work in the machine shop, where he will not have time to idle. He has a quarrel with the foreman. His father, angry and disappointed, writes out a check for $5,000.00, hands it to Victor and tells him, "When that's spent, you needn't come back!" Victor loses the money gambling and wires his mother for more. Mr. Upton learns the import of the message and telegraphs him a refusal. Victor, unable to find work, is homeless and penniless. Incidentally, he meets his own father, who is a veritable hobo, and to his horror, learns the truth. The boy decides to ask Mr. Upton for another chance. Mr. Upton, seeing that Victor has learned a lesson, receives him cordially. Victor conquers his inherited tendency and shows his gratitude to his foster parents, proving himself a valuable business man and an everlasting credit to those who have cared for him.

A MODEL YOUNG MAN (Mar. 20).—No sooner had Jack proposed to Nell, his sweetheart, and been accepted, than Auntie enters, and after congratulations, suggests that he speak to father. Jack is not enthusiastic, but Auntie insists. The interview is satisfactory, Jack omitting to mention that his wealthy grandfather allows him only a small income. He buys an engagement ring, which uses up all his cash, and telegraphs to grandpa for more; "for charitable work," but after three days of anxious waiting, receives no answer. After a strenuous night with "the boys," and a little game of poker, Jack, on the following morning, has a headache, his room is a wreck and all he has left from the game is a lone white chip. When Fittem, his tailor, delivers an ultimatum concerning a bill past due, Jack says, "Tell him I'm dead!"

While shopping that morning, Auntie and Nell discover their money has been stolen. Fearing to lose the dress selected, Nell decides to borrow some money from Jack. When she knocks at Jack's door, he thinks it is the tailor and prepares to give him a warm reception. Finding it is Nell, he nearly faints. She is astonished at the appearance of the room and asks him what is the matter. He pretends illness, and accepting his explanation, she tells him of her errand. He nearly collapses. He is then kept busy explaining why his shoes are on the piano, his watch in a glass of water and his trouble with the persistent tailor. She decides to stay to lunch, ordering an elaborate meal for herself, while he orders a weinerwurst and a glass of beer, but the waiter, upon being refused immediate payment, gathers up the dishes and departs. Nell bursts into tears. Later, she reminds him of the loan and Jack becomes desperate. Auntie, meanwhile, worried over Nell's absence, arrives, bringing Jack a telegram from his grandfather, extending him unlimited credit, and Jack, in an ecstacy of joy, writes out a check for his tailor and one for Nell, then putting his arms around both women, breathes a prayer of thankfulness for his narrow escape.

OLD RELIABLE (Special—2 parts—Mar. 21).—To shield his employer's son, Daniel Wray, known to Raymond, the banker, as "Old Reliable," takes the blame of a theft and accepts the law's penalty of a ten-year term in the penitentiary. The son, Cliff Raymond, who has been leading a reckless and fast life, is sent West by his father to reform and become a useful man. It is because Cliff resented his being sent away that he rifled the safe in his father's bank. The years elapse, and "Old Reliable" is released from the grim confines of his prison and turned out upon the world. He has a hard time finding employment, but finally succeeds in getting a position in a restaurant. Cliff is called home by his father, who offers to reinstate him in his good graces and to make him a partner in business. Cliff is delighted with the prospects and takes advantage of the opportunity. He leaves the West and joins his father.

Employed as stenographer at the bank, is Doris, "Old Reliable's" beautiful daughter. She is a good girl and is very much liked by her kind-hearted employer. She accepts an invitation to dine with Cliff at the restaurant where her father is employed. She does not know of her father's whereabouts, he having decided to conceal his identity to avoid casting a shadow on the life of his daughter. At the supper, Cliff makes strong love to Doris, and arouses the fear and anger of the father, who takes her away from him and rebukes him for his conduct. In a stirring scene, in which Cliff and "Old Reliable" speak of what took place in the past, and which is overheard by the banker, concealed behind a screen, Cliff is denounced and again dismissed by his father, who sends him away forever, and takes back the old friend and servitor who did so much to prove his loyalty to his benefactor.

TALK No. 18

The Old Story

Some time ago a prospective purchaser of a machine and outfit came into my show room to select his M.P. machinery, Economizers, etc. Somebody had talked him chuck full of everything but the best. There are salesmen in this business who for fear that they will lose your order will offer for sale the lowest grade goods at the very lowest possible prices. This man did not know the good from the bad, as he had no experience. He had, however, been told by some unscrupulous salesman that he could secure an equipment for something like $200 less than a good equipment would really cost him. It was my pleasure to make a demonstration of the highest grade moving picture machines with "HALLBERG" ECONOMIZER equipment in comparison with the low grade outfit which the low grade salesman had tried to induce this man to buy. There is no question but what this party would have bought the cheapest if he had not seen the best in actual operation in my show room.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE ALARM CLOCK (Third of Octavius—Amateur Detective Series—Mar. 16).—Mrs. Frothingham prided herself on her jewels, and on one remarkably handsome pearl necklace in particular. She kept them locked in a small wall safe, in her room, where she felt that they were perfectly secure because nobody knew the combination of the safe but herself. That is to say, Mrs. Frothingham thought nobody else knew the combination. As a matter of fact, her most trusted maid had devoted a year's patient study towards that very end. When she had at length mastered the secret, she stole the necklace, hid it in her alarm clock, and went about her business.

When Octavius read of Mrs. Frothingham's loss, his soul was, as ever, moved by the spectacle of a beautiful woman in distress. So he went to Mrs. Frothingham and proffered his services. A searching cross-examination of the servants convinced Octavius that the butler was the guilty person, so he "shadowed" him in the most approved manner. The butler, catching Octavius spying on him from behind a curtain, summarily ejected him from the house. Meanwhile, the maid was becoming a trifle alarmed. Mrs. Frothingham had engaged two professional detectives in addition to Octavius. The maid, fearing the real detectives, determined on a bold play.

Giving Octavus a package containing the alarm clock, she asked him to take it to her confederate in an Italian barber shop. The unsuspecting Octavius willingly consented. The confederate was absent when he arrived at the barber shop, and Octavius decided to have a shave.

While he was being shaved, one of the barbers discovered that Octavius' package was unmistakably ticking. Since they had lately received a black hand letter, the Italian jumped at the obvious conclusion that the package contained an infernal machine. The police were called, and Octavius was dragged off to the station. An examination of the supposed infernal machine led to the discovery of the necklace.

Octavius had an unpleasant quarter of an hour but it was not difficult for a young man of his attainment to turn the whole affair into a proof of his excellence as a detective. He graciously refused the reward proffered by the grateful Mrs. Frothingham, but accepted an invitation to dinner. But when Octavius came to the dinner, the butler met him at the door and Octavius went away very quickly.

A REAL HELPMATE (Mar. 17).—Gilbert Reade was a small man. Possessed of fair abilities, he had established the splendid reputation of his company entirely with the brains of Guy Maxwell, his assistant. Instead of giving Maxwell his just dues, however, he kept him on a small salary. Even the fact that Maxwell had married his niece seemed no reason to Reade for allowing his gratitude to take any tangible form. At last, on the advice of his wife, Maxwell resigned his position with Reade, and started to work for himself. He succeeded from the first.

Three years later, Maxwell, now a prosperous architect, with a well established business, was devoting heart and soul to the plans for the new civic court house, the architect of which was to be chosen on the strength of the most favorable front elevation submitted. Reade was also anxious to win the contest, but his desires were hampered by the fact that his present assistant was distinctly lacking in Maxwell's former brilliance and originality. Five days before the contest ended, Reade learned that Maxwell had been seriously injured. Reade took a camera, and went over to Maxwell's house. On the pretext of waiting for his niece, who was with her husband at the hospital, he gained admittance to Maxwell's workroom and, aided by his little grandniece, took a photograph of Maxwell's drawing. Then he returned to his office, and copied the design, line for line, from a print of the photograph.

Since her husband could not work, Marion, who had picked up considerable architectural knowledge, finished the drawing herself and sent it in. On the day the committee met, Reade's stolen drawing was among the first examined. It so impressed the committee, that they accepted it on the spot and returned the other plans unexamined. Marion read of Reade's success, and saw a photograph of the completed drawing in the paper. She instantly went to Reade's office, and with all a woman's cleverness, succeeded in getting the print of the photograph from Reade's assistant. The print showed Reade's guilt without question, for on it was shown the little girl holding up the drawing to the light, so that her granduncle might take its picture. Marion confronted Reade in the committee room with the photograph, and won the day. Maxwell's plan was accepted, and Reade driven out in disgrace.

A WINTER HOLIDAY IN THE BERNESE OBERLAND, SWITZERLAND (Mar. 18).—The Bernese Oberland is situated in the heart of Switzerland. It is region famed for its clear, pure air, and for the utter grandeur of its mountain scenery. The majestic proportions of such of its peaks as the Jungfrau are, of course, too familiar to need citing as examples. One thinks of the Alps at best as bleak inhospitable affairs, among which men live only on sufferance. In connection with them, we picture the arduous endeavors of mountain climbing expeditions, great crevasses in the ice and frenzied hands clutching at a breaking rope.

It is utterly impossible to describe the scenery witnessed from the moving cars. The picture concludes with an exhibition of cross-country skiing by two expert English amateurs, Captain and Mrs. Hinkston. The ski is used at present by the armies of several nations as a means of winter travel. Its efficiency in rough country is adequately proved in this film—for the expert that is.

A BOARDING HOUSE ROMANCE (Mar. 18).—Monsieur Daube was not generally popular in the boarding house. To begin with, he was a foreigner. Worse yet, he was an artist. And worst of all, at least according to Jimmy Wilson's views, Monsieur Daube was in love with Effie, the daughter of the landlady. Effie's mother was the only person in the house who really liked the artist. She thought he was so "refined" and she felt quite sure he was "genteel." He seemed to her an almost ideal person for a son-in-law. Since the landlady was a person who believed in speaking her mind, she made no bones of telling Effie exactly what she wished in this respect.

Effie was a mild little person, but underneath her calm exterior she had a will of her own. She did not in the least intend to marry Daube, and she did intend to mary Jimmy Wilson, but she said nothing and let things progress naturally. One day Jimmy won a magnificent ring in a raffle. He promptly brought it home to Effie, but since it did not fit her, took it away with him again. When Monsieur Daube presented himself at the jewelry shop in which Jimmy worked and asked to look at engagement rings, a bright idea struck Jimmy. He sold Daube the ring he had won for a very fair price, and went to tell Effie about it.

Effie was delighted. She hadn't liked the ring, anyway. Jimmy could buy her a cheaper one, and they could furnish their apartment with the balance of the money. Unfortunately, their conversation was interrupted at this point by the arrival of the landlady and Daube. Jimmy took refuge on the fire-escape. A sudden thunder shower sprang up, and when he was at length able to re-enter the room, he was soaked through. After Jimmy had changed his clothes, the two went up to the artist's studio. Daube, at the time, was painting a picture of Effie's mother. Effie, with a sudden brilliant inspiration, added a moustache and several deep wrinkles to the artist's finished product. That evening Daube announced his engagement to Effie. Immediately afterwards the landlady asked to see her picture. When she saw it she broke it over Daube's head, and gave Effie to Jimmy.

THE DOUBLE SHADOW (Special—2 parts—Mar. 20).—Montague Blake was the silent partner of the firm of Blake and Rebo. Since his entrance into the firm he had filled his office admirably. No partner could possibly have been more silent. For two years he had never even set foot inside the company's offices. The entire management had fallen entirely upon Isaac Rebo. When Rebo informed Blake that things were going very badly and that the firm would be obliged to ask for an extension on the loan from the Union National Bank, Blake was mildly annoyed. But when Marie Fielding, daughter of the president of the bank, told Blake what she thought about his irresponsible attitude toward his business, it was different. Blake decided that any sacrifice was preferable to lowering himself in Marie's estimation. So he went down to business for the first time in his life.

The first thing that confronted the amateur business man was a startling series of figures, the general effect of which was that the firm was insolvent to the extent of $20,000. Rebo was non-committal. He was sorry things had reached such a condition, but there was no help for it. Blake, in dismay, went to Fielding's office and asked for another loan. The president curtly refused. Marie Fielding overheard the conversation and determined to help the young man. Drawing $20,000 from her personal account, she sent it to Blake anonymously. Blake took the money down to the office just in time to stave off bankruptcy proceedings on the part of the creditors.

As a matter of fact, the firm's affairs were in a prosperous state. For some time past Rebo had been stealing the firm's resources, and covering his actions by means of a false set of books. He hid his stolen funds in the cellar of the building. Ezra Plunkett, the cashier, suspecting the truth dogged Rebo's footsteps continually. Blake, also suspicious, watched both of them. Plunkett exposed his hand when Rebo was buying a steamship ticket for his projected flight. "Better make it two, Mr. Rebo," he said, and Rebo was forced to obey. Then, after the two men had formed a compact, Plunkett attempted to leave the other in the lurch by escaping with the entire booty. Unfortunately for his scheme, he was caught by Blake, and ordered by that young man to carry out his plans with Rebo to the letter. As a result, Rebo was caught red-handed and given up to justice. Blake discovered that Marie was his unknown benefactor. In view of the splendid start the young man had made, neither the girl or her father could see any reason why the match, both young people desired, should be longer deferred.

THE MESSAGE IN THE ROSE (Mar. 21).—One day Joe, the florist's assistant, kissed Mary, his employer's daughter. He used this eminently suitable and proper action as a means of expressing his undying fondness for the above-mentioned Mary. Mary drew herself up coldly, and asked him how he dared take such a liberty. This, as it happens, is a not infrequent means of expressing a certain feeling of interest on the part of a lady in the case, but Joe did not know it. He thought he had mortally offended Mary. So he resigned his position with her father. And here begins the story of the rose. Mary, left alone, wrote four little words on a tiny scrap of paper. The words were, "I love you, Joe." She hid this paper in the heart of a beautiful white rose.

As luck would have it, Mary's father sold the rose to a young man that very afternoon. The young man carried it to his girl. Later, another young man called on the same girl, found the rose, and angrily threw it into the street. It fell at the feet of Giovanna, an old Italian woman. She picked it up and smelled it. At once, bustling America faded from her eyes, and she dreamed of her long vanished youth. Giovanna's youth had something in it of the fierce tropic heat of the land wherein her early years were spent. To begin with, there was a savage fight in the market place with another woman. Then arrest and confinement, from which she escaped, because of the havoc her dark eyes played with a sergeant of the police. And then the road—the long windy brown gypsy trail with smugglers and other outlaws. And finaly, the depths of tragedy, when her police lover followed her, and was killed by her smuggler lover. Giovanna was imprisoned. Years later she was released only to leave her native land, an exile, forever.

The harsh voice of a policeman aroused Giovanna from her dream. She sadly dropped the rose on the pavement and shuffled on her way. The policeman picked up the rose and gave it to a little girl. The little girl carried it to her uncle. As he sat gazing at it sadly, he suddenly saw the slip of paper hidden in its petals. He drew out the slip and read it. Then he rushed back to Mary. The little girl's uncle was Joe.

BIOGRAPH.

FOR AULD LANG SYNE (Mar. 9).—Son lost his position in the city and came back to the old country store. His wife wanted to go to her people. Perhaps that accounted for Son's bebavior and the quarrel that drove her away. Anyway, dad soon grew tired of Son's insistence on modern business methods—all bills and no trade. At last Providence called Son away by the news of an own son, and father's old cronies helped him back to his own.

HER HAND (Mar. 12).—Olga, true to the cause their hearts held so dear, stole the evidence which would send her friends to Siberia, but Orlanof, of the Russian police, sentenced the prisoners without it. Ivan, Olga's brother, in hiding, volunteered to do away with Orlanof. Olga now loved that most hated man and saved him with her own life.

BLAME THE TAILOR (Mar. 14).—Mabel put on her new suit. Mabel did not have an automatic neck, but a high collar can make a neck do things. So Mabel's neck did not behave. "Come on along," it said, and they came.

SHORTY MAKES A BET (Mar. 14).—No use trying to faze Shorty. Five thousand dollars reward up for Equine Bill, he bet he was the guy that would get him. To further play the hero, he slept in Seal's haunted house. Equine Bill stepped in to get acquainted. Ghosts appeared—but in the scramble Shorty made good.

ESSANAY.

OH, DOCTOR! (Mar. 17).—Beulah Crane, a student at boarding school, becomes very much interested in a young fellow she thinks is a doctor. The girls of the school finally capture "Swifty" Cleff and introduce him to Beulah, who falls desperately in love with him. She tries all kinds of different ways to again see her sweetheart and each time Miss Boan, the lady principal, interferes. Finally, Beulah plays sick and the girls rush for the "doctor," bring him into the room and leave him with her. A few moments later the girls return, and he tells them he is a piano-tuner, not a doctor. He is mobbed. Beulah again frames another stunt and the piano-tuner gets into the school. This time, however, when he leaves he takes Beulah as his bride.

LUCK IN ODD NUMBERS (Mar. 18).—George Dover is in love with Mrs. Edna Green, a wealthy widow, but despairs of ever winning her, as he has nothing to offer her but his love. He calls Edna up and tells her he is going West, so Edna devises a scheme whereby George will have enough worldly goods to endow her with. She organizes a lottery company with a capital prize of $25,000 and only one ticket to be sold. Her accomplice calls on George and sells him the ticket No. 33, and the next day George is informed that 33 was the lucky number and that he has won the $25,000. George is overjoyed and calls Edna up, only to learn that she has gone to the country in her machine. Edna telegraphs her maid that should 33 call to turn the house over to him, and as this is the messenger boy's number that brings the telegram, the maid insists upon him coming in and extends every courtesy to him. The easy manner in which the messenger boy accustoms himself to luxurious living will bring screams of laughter from onlookers.

SINGLE HANDED (Mar. 19).—There is no curse like that of jealousy, and nothing is too contemptable for a jealous man to do to win the object of him affections. Jack Travors, sheriff, and Reina Valdez are sweethearts. Dr. Karl, the village physician, is also an aspirant for the hand of the fair Reina, but she has a natural aversion to him and whenever he attempts to make love to her, she repulses him. The stage coach is held up by two desperate bandits, and after a thrilling chase they are captured by the sheriff and posse, but not before the sheriff has his arm broken. Dr. Karl is called to attend Travors, and that night, alone with the injured man, he administers a sleeping potion, procures the keys of the jail, liberates the two bandits and returns the keys to the still drugged man. Next morning the sheriff is awakened, informed of the escape and, with his arm in a sling, starts out alone after the bandits. Their capture is effected in an exciting manner. Travors now finds out who let them escape, and lodges the doctor in jail with the two bandits. He then claims Reina for his own.

A HOT TIME IN SNAKEVILLE (Mar. 21).—Mustang Pete and Slippery Slim, two care-free bachelors, live together amicably until Mustang finds fault with Slim's cooking. Slim tells him if he doesn't like it to do the cooking himself. They read a personal in a newspaper, that an affectionate widow would like to marry a dependable man at once, and as both cannot have her, they draw straws, and Mustang loses. Slippery writes to the widow that he will meet her on the Friday stage. Mustang slips out to the mail box and changes Friday to Tuesday. Dressing in his Sunday best, Mustang meets the stage Tuesday. Sophie steps out and clasps him in her arms, but to his surprise and horror she is not alone, four children follow her, ranging in age from 16 to 6. Mustang takes the crowd to his cabin where they proceed to raise roughhouse. He is in a quandary, so invokes the help of Slim. Slim advises him to frighten her away, which Mustang attempts to do, but only succeeds in arousing Sophie's ire and getting banged up. Slim now steps in and offers to take Sophie to the station and, what is his surprise and joy to find that the children are her Sunday School class. Sophie and Slim lose no time in getting married and they have a good laugh on Mustang.

SHADOWS (Special—2 parts—Mar. 20).—The story opens with a newspaper notice to the effect that Demarest, noted counterfeiter, is again in operation. Fanny Turner, a girl reporter, is assigned to get the story, at the same time that Grayson, one of the best in the U. S. Secret Service, is also assigned to "get" Demarest.

Through Fate, Fanny Turner and Grayson meet in a restaurant at which Hortense, one of the band of counterfeiters, has come to pass some of the "phoney" money. Through a picture of Demarest that Fanny has in her possession, Grayson at first is led to believe that she is one of the band, but subsequent explanations show that she is a reporter, and he leaves the restaurant much abashed at [illegible] Hortense has given the waiter a bill [illegible] her check and he has taken it to [illegible]. Here the bill is discovered to be [illegible] and Hortense, realizing that the game is up, makes a dash through an open window to liberty. On the street she lands on top of policeman O'Mally, knocking him to the ground, just as Fanny, who [illegible] scented game, rushes from the restaurant in time to swing on the rear of the automobile in which Hortense is escaping. O'Mally makes a futile try at capturing the car, but fails. He, however, finds one of Fanny's cards, which she has had presence of mind enough to drop. At every block or so she continues to drop one of her business cards, thus leaving a trail to wherever she is going. Meanwhile, Grayson, in search of further information, has gone to police headquarters and arrives there shortly after Officer O'Mally arrives, telling the chief of the evening's escapade. Grayson sees the card, compares it to the one which Fanny gave him in the restaurant and immediately deduces that she is on the trail of the counterfeiters. With the chief's permission, O'Mally shows Grayson to the spot where he found the card. After many hours searching down side streets and by-ways, Grayson finaly arrives in front of the saloon in which the gang operates. Here he finds another of Fanny's cards with the note "in here" written on it. Realizing that he is powerless to act that night he leaves, returning the next morning, representing himself as the telephone repair man come to fix the telephone (the wires of which he cut the previous evening). Casey, the proprietor of the saloon, does not suspect anything and shows Grayson to the basement. Here Grayson finds the telephone wires (which he has already joined) and also parts of a speaking tube. Thinking he hears voices, he listens carefully, and hears Casey upstairs talking to the crooks on the other side of the stone partitioned basement. He cuts the speaking tube, stops up the ends of the mouthpiece with rags and then taking a pocket phone from his pocket, cuts in on the line and telephones for help. Fate enters here—Casey, upstairs, knocks over the phone. Thinking that perhaps it is fixed, he listens and hears Grayson talk. When Grayson returns to the room there is a fight, in which Grayson is successful, after which he makes Casey show him the method of entering the basement. He leaves Casey bound, but not tight enough, for a minute or so after he (Grayson), reaching the basement rendezvous, and has the crooks all rounded up, Casey enters and they get him. They then plan a fiendish revenge on Fanny and him, in the shape of a bandage containing two rubber cups filled with powder, the fuse of which they light, leaving them with the fuse burning. Meanwhile the police have arrived and as Demarest and the rest of the crooks exit from the basement entrance, they are all captured. The officer in charge enters the basement and snatches the bandages off of Grayson's and Fanny's eyes just as they explode. The story ends with the capture of the crooks.

Then follows a closeup, showing Grayson's hand placing a solitaire diamond ring on Fanny's hand, a novel way of showing that the adventure ultimately lead to their engagement.

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 18, 1914 (Mar. 2).—Newark, N. J.—Over the way trod by George Washington and his ragged band of patriots in the bleak dawn of American liberty, there now marches a host to honor his memory on his natal day.

St. Petersburg, Fla.—Raymond V. Morris skims over Tampa Bay at 100 miles an hour, record speed, in his new hydroplane—smallest in the world.

Montreal, Can.—A glide, a leap, a swift flight through the frosty air with the earth far, far below and you have the thrills of skiing as champions have them at the National meet here.

Massillon, Ohio.—Gen. Jacob S. Coxey prepares to lead another army of unemployed to Washington, emulating his famous march of 20 years ago.

Red Bank, N. J.—Fleetest of yachts are the delicate craft whose forms flit over the ice-coated Shrewsbury in rivalry for the racing championship of the world.

London, England.—With medieval pomp and splendor King George and Queen Mary travel in the royal stage coach through the streets to open Parliament.

Dallas, Texas.—Untamed bronchos, tricky and mean, are mounted and ridden by cowboys at the National Corn Show. These are the meanest horses to be found in Texas—and that's "Some mean."

Denver, Colo.—Here is the rarest sort of political leaders, a woman State Chairman. She is Mrs. Gertrude Lee, head of the Democratic organization in Colorado, on her way to cast her vote in a city election.

Atlanta, Ga.—On its arrival here, the body of Senator Bacon is given signal honors.

New Orleans, La.—Batter up for 1914! First of the big league base ball teams to go South, the Cleveland Naps begin their training here for the season.

WHIFFLES AND THE DIAMOND PIN (Mar. 17).—Whiffles is expecting an unpleasant call from the loan shark who has advanced him some money at a frightful rate of interest. In order to forestall any unpleasantness he writes a memorandum for his servant to the effect that if Simpkins, the money lender, calls, to tell him that Mr. Whiffles has gone out of town for a week. Here is the most thrilling detective story you ever saw. Not a dull scene in the whole twenty-six hundred feet.

Detective Finn

Scotland Yard

is retained by Lord Gray to solve the mysterious robbery of a very valuable jewel, given by him to his wife on the previous day. How the detective, after a series of exciting adventures, nearly losing his life on more than one occasion, succeeds in shadowing one of London's cleverest crooks to his hiding place, only to be caught in a trap, from which his faithful dog frees him, and then captures the gentleman thief, is shown in three intense interest-gripping reels.

he makes a notation for himself to the effect that he has an appointment to meet a charming lady near the rustic bridge in the park. He intends to tear off the lower part of the memo from the upper, but just then Simpkins calls and Whiffles has barely time to hide in a couch before the money lender has forced his way in. Simpkins catches sight of the memorandum and regardless of any delicacy of feeling reads it. He at once sees his opportunity and departs to perfect his plans.

Arriving home he explains his plans to his attractive young wife and enlists her support. She goes to the park earlier than the time of Whiffles' appointment and sees a young woman apparently keeping an appointment. She bribes a park employee to carry a note to the girl, ostensibly from Whiffles regretting that he is unable to keep his appointment. The girl reads the note and leaves, Mrs. Simpkins taking her place on the bench. In the meantime Whiffles' friend, Gainsworth, has called upon him, wearing a magnificent scarf pin. The envious Whiffles persuades his friend to loan him the pin for the afternoon and Whiffles leaves the house to keep his appointment. What happens when he gets there is too good to tell. See the film and learn for yourself

COL. HEEZA LIAR SHIPWRECKED (Mar. 18).—Since the Colonel's trip to Africa he has wonderfully developed his muscles and gives a remarkable exhibition of his strength. Reading of the troubles in Mexico he decided to sail thither, stop the war and make himself emperor. So he embarks on an ocean greyhound superbly confident in himself. But misfortune pursues him. His vessel is wrecked and the gallant Colonel finds himself adrift upon the raging main astride of a spar and with the mighty waves threatening to tear him from his perch.

Finally the sea becomes calm and our hero drifts on, hungry and thirsty. He sees a bottle floating near him and thinks to have a drink, but the bottle contains nothing but a paper containing a few lines of writing from another wrecked mariner and that is all. A mighty whale then engulfs him in his yawning maw and carries him to a tiny island, where he throws him up on the land. Our hero finds to his great delight a fine cocoanut palm growing there and refreshes himself with food and drink from one of the nuts. Then he lays himself down to sleep content. But he is not destined to be left in peace. He is kidnapped by a stork, which flies with him to Mexico, where he meets with further surprising adventures.

MADURA AND ITS PAGODAS (Mar. 18).—No greater contrast in styles of architecture can be imagined than these wonderful old Eastern edifices as compared with the buildings of modern cities. Pagodas, quaint images and strange people all combine to make an interesting scenic.

THE WASTED YEARS (Special—2 parts—Mar. 19).—Mr. Marshall learns of another misdeed on the part of his son, Jack, that proves to be the last straw. Infuriated, he adds a codicil to his will in which he revokes the bequest of his fortune to Jack and bequeaths it all to his foster-son, Henry. Jack is informed of his father's decision and with his usual weakness determines to kill himself. His father comes into the room just in time to seize the pistol and prevent the rash and unmanly act. Far from being softened, he sees in the matter new arguments to confirm him in his step. He sends for Henry, shows him the will with its codicil and then lays it down upon the table on top of the loaded pistol. A little later, to emphasize his remarks, he strikes the paper with his hand and the pistol is discharged into his body. Jack and the butler, hearing the shot, rush in and find the distracted Henry kneeling before the dead body of Mr. Marshall. The butler craftily takes the will and, unseen by Henry, cuts off the codicil. Jack, though he at heart knows the truth, accuses his brother of deliberately murdering his father, the sooner to gain the money. A policeman is called in and the butler then demands and is promised by Jack hush money for his share in the fraud.

A few months later Jack marries an heiress, but his marriage does not reform him. He speculates in Wall Street and before long has lost all his money and his wife's as well. He confesses his folly to his wife and together they leave for a little farm up-State, where they plan to live and start life anew. In the meantime the butler has left service, planning to live "on Easy Street" with the regular income from Jack. But he has an unpleasant wakening. He receives a letter from his partner in fraud, enclosing a small sum of money and saying that it is all that can be sent him, as things have been going badly of late. Shortly afterward he carelessly throws a burning match upon the floor after lighting his pipe. Through his carelessness there is an oil stove explosion and he is severely injured. As he lies dying, in the presence of witnesses, he makes his confession of fraud, implicates Jack in the crime and asserts Henry's innocence. As a result of this confession Henry is acquitted and released from prison.

Through a little amateur detective work he learns the whereabouts of his foster brother and loses no time in looking him up. There is a dramatic meeting between the two. Stung by the wronged man's reproaches and fearing the exposure of his villainy, Jack attacks him, but in the struggle falls from a cliff and is killed. A little later two detectives on the trail of the dead man arrive just in time to save Henry from arrest as the murderer of his foster brother and to prove the villainy of Jack.

HIS WIFE WINS (Special—2 parts—Mar. 21).—Hector Barisart is a sort of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. In the one capacity he is the dignified and loving husband of his charming wife, Eugenie. In the other he wears different clothes, assumes a different name and has another flat, and above all is a debonair hunter of hearts, known to his cronies as Julius Cornaillac. Eugenie is so simple and unsuspecting that all goes well until Mr. Buttin and his wife come to stay at the house. Mrs. Buttin is a horse of another color. She suspects the dignified Hector as being a dissembler. In the capacity of Julius, Hector is taking music lessons of a charming girl by the name of Zenobie and incidentally making violent love to her. Incidentally she expects that he will marry her. She receives a letter from her uncle, saying that he will shortly visit her and that he expects to meet her fiance. This sobers Julius and in order to establish an innocent character with his wife before the blow falls, he deliberately writes a note to his wife, telling her that her husband is deceiving her and that he lunched with another woman that same day at the Cafe Anglais. When taxed with this by his wife, of course he is easily able to prove an alibi. Mrs. Buttin, however, points out that it is his own handwriting and, of course, that settles it.

Then he determines to call at his own house in the character of Julius. He writes upon his card that he would be glad to make the acquaintance of Mr. Barisart, for whom he has been often mistaken. Things are going on all right when Zenobie is brought unexpectedly by her uncle to call upon Eugenie's mother. Hector is then in a disagreeable position with wife and fiancee, both facing him and he in the character of Julius. Things get so warm that he is obliged to take Mr. Buttin into his confidence when he sprains his knee, and the old man acts as his crutch. His tell-tale clothes are rescued from his burning flat and he attempts to change into them under the table. But the way of the transgressor is hard and murder will out. The ubiquitous Mrs. Buttin after the clothing is changed and everything is lovely, comes on to the scene to spill the fat into the fire and put poor Hector in wrong.

LUBIN.

THE LAZIEST MAN (Mar. 17).—In a little Western town there lived a man who was called "It." He was so lazy that he would not feed himself, and the miners' wives and daughters took it upon themselves to look after him. Finally a crisis arrived when the men were neglected to such an extent that when they arrived home from work in the mines they were unable to get anything to eat, so they held a meeting of ways and means of geeting rid of the thing which took all the time of their better-halves and they decided to bury "It." They build a box and go to the home of "It" and took "It" from its pedestal upon which the women had placed it. They place "It" in a box and start on their journey to a hole in the ground. En route they meet a farmer with a load of corn who is inquisitive. The miners tell him the man is lazy and that he is breaking up their homes. The generous farmer offers to give him his load of corn as a starter. The lazy man gradually raises his head from the box and asks if the corn is shelled. On being told that it is not, he tells the boys to go on: he prefers to be buried. They take him on, put him in the grave and start covering him up. The wives, in the meantime, have secured the assistance of the constable, and they, themselves, come upon the ground at the psychological moment and save the thing inanimate from its long last slumber, much to the disgust of the husbandmen.

THE WEAKER BROTHER (Special—2 parts—Mar. 18).—Colonel Jackson has a son, who has a weakness for drink and cards, named Harry, and a daughter, Dorothy. Denton has Harry in his toils through a big card debt. For that reason Harry is compelled to submit to Denton's efforts to win Dorothy. War is declared and Jackson is ordered to his regiment. Harry enlists and Denton is ordered to report to the same regiment on the commissary end. The war progresses and they find themselves driven to bay near the old home. Unless provisions arrive that night Denton tells Jackson word will have to be sent to Lee for help. Harry is selected at Denton's suggestion to bear the despatches to Lee. Denton is already in the service of the North as a secret agent. Next morning Denton finds Harry on his way, and by promising to cancel the debt he gets Harry to

QUALITY-SERVICE

We, of Warner's Features, Inc., take pride in the fact that we have a splendid staff of field men, whose conscientious efforts to render our rapidly growing clientele a distinct SERVICE apart from their bookings, have spread the name and fame of WARNER'S FEATURES to every hamlet the country over. These men know the game from your standpoint and they can oftentimes make suggestions that will save you money.

For example, our managers can recommend a number of splendid features suitable for the Lenten season.

That's our kind of QUALITY-SERVICE.

Think it over!

NEW BRANCH OFFICE IN DETROIT

30 Campau Building

We have established, for the convenience of exhibitors in the Southern Peninsula of Michigan, an exchange in Detroit. Mr. D. Broderick, who is in charge, is ready to render the same efficient "Quality-Service" to exhibitors in his territory that Warner's Features, Inc., gives elsewhere. He will be especially pleased to meet all former customers of the Cleveland office who will find it to their advantage to call or communicate with him at Detroit.

MARION LEONARD IS BACK

On the Program of Warner's Features, Inc.

NOTED SCREEN STAR DELIGHTED, SHE SAYS

"I am delighted with the terms of our agreement," said Miss Marion Leonard, in speaking of the negotiations that ended in her return to the program of Warner's Features, Inc. "I did not realize that my productions had found such unanimous favor in the eyes of wideawake exhibitors," she continued, "and you can assure them for me and for my director, Mr. Taylor, that we are preparing some splendid features. 'The Rose of Yesteryear' you have already reviewed (we have; it's great), and the productions to follow in the near future are 'The Awakening of Donna Isolla' and 'Judgment.'"

Stanner E. V. Taylor, who produces all of Miss Leonard's features, also expressed himself as satisfied that, through Warner's Features, Inc., Miss Leonard would reach a greater number of the loyal fans who eagerly await her plays, than through any other medium or agency. He spoke enthusiastically of his hopes and ambitions and declared that he would shortly start work on a production with Miss Leonard in the stellar role that would eclipse anything she has previously done before the camera.

Miss Marion Leonard needs no introduction nor boost from us. She has created a reputation for clever, pantomimic acting by constant study and long experience. No word that we might give utterance to will add one whit to her reputation; her productions speak for themselves.

This, then, is the startling news that we promised would be released this week.

What do you think of it?

THE COURSE OF JUSTICE

"Dot" Farley in a New Role

IN THREE PARTS

Since her appearance in Warner's Features, Miss Dorothea Farley has endeared herself to thousands of new admirers. These admirers will therefore be charmed with the powerful role Miss Farley plays in "The Course of Justice"—that of the unhappy wife who becomes a lawyer and is thereby enabled to save her father from the toils of the law when he takes the life of the man who wrecked her life.

A FATHER'S CRIME

The Folly of Money Marriages

IN THREE PARTS

Intense, dramatic action and a plot of unusual heart interest, combine to make this a splendid offering. The folly of a marriage for money is brought out forcibly, and a scheming father who sought to ruin the happiness of his only daughter by choosing her husband, lives to see the error of his course and the final reunion of his daughter with the man of her choice.

agree to meet Phillips, a Yanko officer, at an old shack and surrender the papers. Dorothy bids Harry goodbye and gives him her photo. Harry meets Phillips, who gets the despatches and discovers Dorothy's photo. He sneers at Harry for being a traitor when he has such a beautiful sister. Harry remorseful, attacks Phillips to get the papers back, but Phillips gets the best of him and leaves him tied hand and foot, carrying away both papers and photo.

Denton in the meantime insults Dorothy. Phillips saves her from Denton. Denton sneaks off and Phillips agrees to take Dorothy back inside her own lines. Phillips is disguised as a Confederate and has the password. Harry's horse has returned, and his father is leaving to search for him when Denton gets back. He accuses Harry and offers to lead Col. Jackson to the man who has the papers and who is also trying to steal his daughter. Phillips' horse goes lame and he sees the Confederate bearing down upon him. He quickly gives the papers and photo to Dorothy and tells her of her brother's predicament. He is captured and Dorothy gets away with the papers. Phillips is taken as a spy in Confederate uniform. Dorothy releases Harry and gives him back his papers. He leaves for Lee and she leaves for home, but stops when she hears shots. Harry has run into a Union party and retires to the shack, where he barricades himself. Dorothy rides home for help while Harry holds the shack against the Yanks. Jackson and Denton at the head of their men go to the rescue. The Yankees beat them back, when Denton sneaks away. Harry, wounded but game, now rushes out and grabbing the fallen flag, saves the day and the Yanks retreat. The despatches are forwarded by another man. Denton runs into the retreating Yankees and is killed. Dorothy and Harry try to save Phillips from being shot, but Phillips in the guardhouse refuses to allow them to disclose the true affair, for it would only disgrace Harry and his father and he still would have to suffer the penalty of being a spy.

The girls round about there decide to give a dance at the Jacksons that night to cheer up the soldiers and Dorothy gets her father to agree. At the dance they discover they are short of men and Dorothy conceives the daring idea of getting the Union soldiers, who are prisoners, to attend the dance on parole. The officers and Jackson agree and Phillips and two others are brought in and asked their disposition in the matter. They agree under Dorothy's persuasion and swear not to try to escape. Dorothy and Phillips learn of each other's love, and she pleads with him to try and escape, but he refuses. The messenger from Lee is brought in badly wounded and dies. Dorothy decides to save Phillips against his will. She has wine brought to all, and his is drugged. When he begins to lose consciousness her negroes support him into the adjoining room. There he is stripped and the clothes of the dead man and Phillips changed. (They had taken his Confederate uniform away and made him get into a Union uniform at his imprisonment). The negro comes out and tells Dorothy. She gets permission from her father to take the dead Confederate out, and he barely notices anything, by the uniform. Dorothy gets him outside the lines with Harry's help, gives him back her photograph and a lover's kiss.

THE SECRET MARRIAGE (Special—2 parts—Mar. 19).—Roger Freeman, son of wealthy Henry Freeman, returns from college to find that his parents have been matchmaking. Before they have time to persuade him to propose to the girl they have selected they discover that he is on the verge of a nervous breakdown, due to overwork at college. The family physician orders him off to the country to recuperate. There he meets Mary Ellis, a country girl, and loses his heart to her. They commit the folly of a secret marriage. After their quiet honeymoon, Roger leaves Mary to go to the city, break the news to his parents and induce them to welcome his wife. During the journey the long-pending breakdown culminates in a fever, accompanied by delirium. Arriving in the city he wanders the streets until a policeman notices him and takes him home. He is put to bed and the doctor who is called pronounces it a case of typhoid. For several weeks he is unconscious.

Meanwhile Mary waits in vain for news from him. A village suitor whom she rejected in Roger's favor, revenges himself on her by spreading a scandal about her and the "smooth city chap" who made a fool of her. Her name becomes a byword in the village and she is scorned by all. Her mother joins in the persecution until life is made so unbearable that she decides to end it. Leaving a note of farewell for her mother, she goes to the river's edge, but there her resolution fails. She wanders distractedly across the fields until, on a country road, a young man city-bound in an auto, offers her a ride to the city. Arriving there, a sign before a maternity hospital [illegible] In the delirium of fever Roger betrays his secret to his parents. They determine to make the best of the situation and Roger's father goes to the village to take Mary to her husband. Then he learns of Mary's supposed suicide and goes back to break the news to his son. Later Roger goes to Europe and Mary, with her infant in her arms, emerges from the [illegible] city.

Years pass [illegible] with the old sorrow still unhealed. Mary, living in the slum district, makes a bare living for herself and her small daughter by the needle. The girl Roger's parents had chosen for him is still unmarried. They renew their plans for the match, especially since they believe the girl will help him to forget the tragedy. At first he resists, but at last, willing to please them, he consents and makes an appointment to take the girl the next night to a fashionable cafe where he plans to propose to her. Meanwhile Mary has fallen desperately ill. A charity doctor called in by a neighbor declares that the case is one of starvation and that unless she has substantial food she will die. The child, unseen by the doctor and the other woman, overhears the remark. Terrified at the prospect of her mother's death, she goes into the streets intending to seek aid. The exterior of the cafe, inside which Roger and the girl are dining, suggests food to her simple mind. Stealing past the footman, she enters the restaurant. A waiter is about to eject her when the uproar attracts the attention of Roger's companion, who makes inquiries of the child. Her request for food for her starving mother excites the girl's curiosity and sympathy and she persuades Roger to go with her to investigate the case. Roger and his companions accompany the child to the tenement, where husband and wife are reunited.

THE PRICE (Mar. 20).—John Wakefield, who has been indulging the extravagances of his wife, Marion, receives news that the Twin Star Mine, in which he is interested, has failed and his fortune has been swept away. When Marion's petulent demands for money continue, John pawns his own valuables to buy her a reception gown. At the reception he finds a necklace, which he returns to Mrs. Burns, the owner. Later, Marion phones John at his office, asking for money. He cannot supply it and she threatens to borrow it from Colfax, an old admirer. At a dinner dance given by Mrs. Burns, the latter tells John that she has not yet had the clasp of her necklace repaired and that the jewels are in her room. John sees Marion with Colfax, and, calling her into the hall, accuses her of accepting money from him. She tells John to get the money for her himself, if he does not want her to borrow. In anger, he resolves to do so and creeping up the stairs, he robs his hostess of her necklace.

This is the beginning of a series of robberies which keep him and Marion in funds. Threatened with detection, however, he goes to another city, where he joins a crook named Bud. They pull off several jobs and John writes telling Marion that he has made good business connections, and sends her money. She sees a great deal of Colfax, but has no thought of infidelity. She is selfish, but not bad. When Colfax approaches her familiarly, she repulses him and then realizes her great mistake. The next morning a telegram arrives telling of the final success of the mine, and Marion starts to take the news to John. Arriving in the city too late to find him, she goes to a hotel, but is seen by Bud, who hurries off to tell John of the chance for robbing a wealthy woman at the "Royal." John agrees to do the job. He goes to the hotel and gets a room. In the night, masked, he enters the parlor of the "woman," but finding nothing of value, starts to enter the bedroom. Marion gets out of bed and takes her revolver from under the pillow. John enters, and not recognizing his wife, struggles with her for the revolver. She suddenly turns her face to his and he recognizes her. In speechless horror, he releases her. She fires. He reels against the wall, and tears the mask from his face, then sinks to the floor. Marion sees that she has killed her husband. Kneeling at his side, she realizes the truth too late.

A TRIP TO THE MOON (Mar. 21).—Two members of the Never-Drop Aero Club claim that they can reach the moon by the aeroplane. They get an astronomer to get his telescope out and see how the conditions are on the moon. He comes on with a big telescope and looks through it, finds everything in fine condition from earth to moon, so the party start out. As they rise and turn upside down then right side up, they start on their journey to the moon. They pass over a busy city, knocking down buildings and chimneys. After passing over the city they come in contact with the planet Saturn. Bump it, encircle it, and then on their way to the moon they ride through the air and see an old man coming out of the planet, Mars. The anchor on the aeroplane accidentally catches the old man by the neck and carries him off. The old man tries to get away, and he sees Halley's comet coming along and he grabs hold of the tail of the comet and goes away. One of the men in the aeroplane sees him and takes out a lasso. With a couple of swings he catches the old man around the neck and drags him behind. At last the moon is reached. The man in the moon opens his mouth and they all go in. The party drop from top of the moon all in a heap. They get up, look around and a large bird comes in and lays an egg larger than itself and flies off. The travelers put the egg on a fire,

Oh, You Beautiful Doll!

SEE

"Our MUTUAL Girl"

In the Land of Dolls, Where She Dreams That She Is a Doll Herself and Having the Finest Time of Her Life!

You Will Find All This and Much More

In the Eighth Reel of the Favorite Serial Motion Picture of the World. Each week gives us a little more experience, and so you get more joy than ever from this Eighth Installment of

"Our MUTUAL Girl"

Though living in New York and surrounded with every luxury, pride has not entered the heart of Margaret. She is just as sweet and sympathetic as when she lived in the country. One day, while she is riding in her wonderful big automobile, she sees some poor school children at play.

Then She Has the Idea!

She decides to buy dolls for all these children, and her aunt permits her to! So this is how Margaret comes to dream of dolls, and why this reel has the most difficult of all things to get in a picture

REAL, GENUINE SENTIMENT

MR. EXHIBITOR:

The most wonderful thing about "Our Mutual Girl" is the manner in which her PERSONALITY has won thousands of new admirers every week. No star of the stage ever made so many friends as this star of the screen. The crowds come to see her because they truly love her. If you lose a week in getting this picture series started at your house, as part of the Incomparable Mutual Service, you lose just so much good hard cash!

which is burning nearby. The egg cracks and a lot of little birds are hatched. Suddenly a strange animal comes on the scene and eats the little birds one by one. The animal fills up and bursts. Another enormous crazy-looking animal comes out of the cave and chase the men off the moon into the sea.

SO LONG, COUNT (Mar. 21).—Pa Mason objects to Jack Boyer as a son-in-law and kicks him off the steps. Mrs. Boyer consoles Jack and, meeting a dwarf, suggests a scheme to him. They rig the dwarf out as a French count and she takes him to see Nell. Nell being coached, pretends to fall violently in love. Then Mason begs Jack to marry Nell, but Jack will have nothing to do with him. At length, in despair, Pa gives a lodge brother the high sign and together they hire a minister to do a little job of marrying and go and kidnap Jack. The minister's arrival makes Nell and the dwarf fear the bluff has been called, but Pa's arrival with Jack saves the situation and Jack marries Nell at the point of the gun with which the dwarf has been threatening Pa. Then Pa discovers that the gun is not loaded and smells a rat. The dwarf demands his pay, but Pa takes it in good part and marries the widow, just to prove there is no hard feelings.

THE STORY OF VENUS (Mar. 17).—Venus, a ward of Jupiter, wishes her to marry one of his two sons, either Vulcan or Mars, but the young woman refuses both. She goes bathing and is rescued by Neptune, a sailor. Strangely, she meets Adonis, a hunter of big game, and they at once fall violently in love with each other. He escorts her to the gate of the palace, and thereafter they contrive to have secret meetings until one day Adonis is killed by a wild bear and she is unconsolable.

Time passes. Venus ever pines for the loss of Adonis, while Vulcan and Mars are still pressing for her hand. Jupiter, alarmed over his daughter's physical condition and general apathy, determines to give a fancy dress garden party to revive Venus' spirits. This succeeds until a disagreeable society matron, representing the Goddess of Discord, who has not been invited, cunningly determines to avenge the affront by tossing an apple into the assembled party, tagged: "For the most beautiful." Jupiter is too wise to pass judgment in such matters and turns the apple over to Paris, and the latter awards it to Venus. Later, Mars and Vulcan are informed by Victory that the one who relieves Venus of the Apple of Discord, will win her. Mars and Vulcan thereupon agree to race for Venus. Mars wins the race, snatches the apple from Venus, tosses it to the pigs of Circe, and she, in gratitude, promises to marry him.

THE COP ON THE BEAT (Mar. 18).—Donald Gale, down in fortune, leaves his little family in New York and goes to Nevada to prospect. He has formed a partnership with a man named Hawkins, but taken seriously ill, he writes out a power of attorney, and gives it to the latter, authorizing him to dispose of his share of the mine (which they have found prospectively rich), in the interests of Mrs. Gale and the children. He then writes to his wife telling her what he has done.

In the interim, Mrs. Cole herself has fallen seriously ill and her children, alarmed, start out for help. Bobby, the boy, encounters Officer Casey. Casey requisitions Dr. Jones, who happens to be passing, and they visit the ailing woman, finding her in a state of collapse, after having read the letter from Nevada. The doctor has the invalid removed to his private hospital and the good Officer Casey says he will keep an eye on the children.

The villainous Hawkins, taking advantage of Gale's trust, sells the mine to a man named Brown, and decamps, leaving the sick man to die alone in the mountains. Brown visits the shack, learns the circumstances, nurses Gale back to health and presents him with his rightful share of the property. Hawkins being bad, gets worse. He goes to New York, blows in his money and becomes a burglar. Fate leads him to the Gale house, and Officer Casey catches him in the act of burglarizing Mrs. Gale of the money that she recently received from her husband. He finds in his search of Hawkins' person, the power of attorney given him by Gale, which identifies him, and eventually convicts him of fraud. Gale comes back in prosperous circumstances; there is a reunion dinner in the Gale home at which "The Cop on the Beat" sits at the head of the table.

THE EVIL WE DO (Mar. 19).—Marie Sanford is a beauty in a little village by the sea, but not of the [illegible] kind. She ensnares the hearts of old Captain Halsey's sons, Jack and Tom, having engaged [illegible] both. Each boy is proud in his conquest until they come to an exchange of confidences when they are returning from a successful trip on their fishing smack. A wild fight follows the revelation. In the scrimmage, the oldest boy goes over the rail. The young one, relenting, dives to his rescue, but both are drowned in the struggle that ensues.

Mourning the dual loss, old Captain Halsey loses his mind. Of course, he loses his position and authority. The fishing company with which he was associated, sends a new manager to the little town, and the giddy, thoughtless Marie, who has been branded by tragedy, immediately falls in love with him, and he, of the flirty sort, co-operates readily. About the time that the scheming Marie feels she is safe in the love of the new man of power and sees her way clear to affluence and a fireside of her own, he receives a telegram, the contents of which the village gossips are soon apprised, which falls into Marie's hands, telling him to return at once, as he is the father of a new baby boy. The power for evil gets a blow that quite crushes her. The boys that she had lured by her charm to their death are a haunting memory; so that she, heartless and thoughtless, is left alone to sorrow in the shadow.

TWO LITTLE VAGABONDS (Mar. 20).—A pair of homeless lads, making a scanty existence by shining boots and running errands up and down the meandering ways of a great city, decide to try a change of fortune. Foot-sore and weary at the end of their first day's adventure, they go to sleep in a barn. The next day, awakened by hunger, they stroll to a nearby farmhouse, and ask for breakfast. This household is graced by a pretty little daughter with whom the wandering lads are much impressed. One of them gives her his last nickel. She hikes to the country store and buys candy, and becomes quite "soft" on her new benefactor. This impresses the other lad so, that he becomes very jealous, and the chums have a falling out.

The mother sends Frances, the little girl, to the store on an errand, and the boys accompany her. There she sees a doll, which she highly covets. Both the boys determine to secure it for her. They have not the money, but each, keeping his own counsel, starts out to earn the necessary quarter. With boyish ingenuity and with thrift, they succeed in securing the necessary amount, and both come back to the store for the purchase at the same time. While they have been hustling to get the five nickles together, a swell little city chap arrives on the scene who has been well supplied with pocket money. He buys the little girl the doll and starts gaily off with her. The chums have quite a tussel to get to the store first, and to their mortification, they find the doll gone. Looking down the road, they see their would-be sweetheart strolling away with the doll in her arm, and one arm of the youthful swell about her waist. Disgusted with feminine perfidy, the two little vagabonds shake hands, swear eternal friendship and "beat it" back to the big city.

THE YEGG AND THE EGGS (Mar. 12).—Mr. Morrison, a prosperous business man, loves eggs, but they are out of his reach, so he buys a hen and starts in to raise his own eggs. He hires a uniformed officer to walk up and down outside the chickenyard carrying a gun and guarding the hen. He hopes in this way to get a few eggs without crippling himself financially.

"Spike" Murphy is released from the penitentiary. While Spike is standing in front of a restaurant wistfully looking in, Morrison brushes against him and steps into his car. As Spike is crossing the street an automobile bowls him over. The machine whirls on without its owner taking the trouble to look around. Getting up, Spike watches which house it runs into. Spike follows and peeps through the window. There he sees Mr. Morrison, the man who refused him the job. Spike sees the uniformed officer come in, salute and give Mr. Morrison an egg. Mr. Morrison is elated and places the egg with five others packed in cotton in a rosewood box. This he puts in an iron safe and turns the combination.

Spike jimmies the window, gets inside, bores a hole in the door of the iron safe, puts in the "soup," covers the safe with a wet blanket and blows off the door. Seizing the rosewood box of eggs, Spike wings down off the window ledge and escapes. Mr. Morrison is heartbroken that his priceless eggs are stolen. He puts vivifying powder on the fingermarks on the safe so that the impressions may be seen and photographs taken.

When Spike escapes he takes his treasure and hides it and then goes to a pawnbroker with one of the eggs. For this one egg the pawnbroker counts him out dollar after dollar. He still has money left. The pawnbroker watches him cross the street and order a suit from the tailor.

Mr. Morrison goes from one pawnbroker to another until at last he arrives at the shop where Spike pawned the egg. There he puts some of the powder on the egg and compares it with the photo prints from his iron safe. They are the same. The pawnbroker points out the tailor and the tailor looks up the address where he sent the suit.

Mr. Morrison arrives at Spike's room. Spike is running his hands through the eggs in miser-like manner. Mr. Morrison makes him a prisoner with his gun. Spike watches his chance and seizes the box of eggs and tells Mr. Morrison that if he shoots he will hurl the box to the floor. To show that he means it, Spike takes out an egg and throws it down. This almost breaks Mr. Morrison's heart. Spike tells him of hard luck, etc., and then Mr. Morrison understands that he has driven him to this deed. The two go back to Mr. Morrison's home and each eats one of the valuable eggs. Then Mr. Morrison gives Spike a job guarding the hen, so the yegg starts in to lead a new life.

THE ELECTRIC GIRL (Feb. 22).—Hezekiah Bean and his wife, Miranda, are greatly vexed with the servant problem. Each servant wishes the best room in the house, three nights a week off, and breaks so many dishes that the kitchen of Hezekiah sounds like a shooting gallery and resembles a battlefield. They employ a midget, but she is in a class with the rest. Miranda engages a beautiful young lady who suits Hezekiah's eye very much. The same young lady, however, takes an electrical treatment, which completely magnetizes her so that all needles, hardware, etc., are attracted by her presence and cling to her like a loving parent. The servant girl with the magnetic personality is unfortunately sent to the hardware store and comes very nearly putting that emporium of tins and steel ware out of business. The entire stock laying on the shelves jump from their place as one piece to greet her, and she retires from the shop looking like a cross between a hardware exhibit and a well-furnished kitchen. When she returns Hezekiah gently tells her that she will have to find some other field in which to exercise her drawing powers.

PICTURESQUE COLOMBO (Feb. 22).—A magnificent series of colored views showing the wonderful city of Colombo, which is the port as well as the English city of the Island of Ceylon. The wonderful pagodas and temples of Colombo are shown in all their beauty, and the native Zingalese with their peculiar customers and manners form an interesting study. The famous Island of Slaves is clearly seen, and the views we are taken on a panoramic journey through the beautiful nooks and corners of this picturesque country.

WHEN GOD WILLS (Two Parts—Mar. 18).—Harris, a [illegible], is lying sick, attended by his devoted wife. The only chance of saving the sick man's life is by taking him to the famous specialist in Seattle; but their funds are low and there seems but little chance of this.

While at the general store the wife learns that there is to be a dance that night at the Town Hall. That night when the sick man is dozing, she throws a shawl over her head and steals off to the dance to watch for a while the pleasures of life she is denied. In the midst of the dance, Pete, the bad man of the camp, comes in loaded down with gold which he has struck in the creek. Martha is barred at the door, but Pete, struck by her beauty, forces the doorman aside. Pete asks her for a dance. Martha refuses. The bad man says he will pay her $100 for one waltz.

Thinking only of her husband and their dire need she consents. Pete offers her $1,000 for a kiss. The sick man's wife hides her revulsion and while they are dancing allows him to kiss her. He tries to seize her again, but she breaks away, and rushes to her cabin, followed by the bad man and the village gossips. Pete rushes in and, throwing the sick man aside, seizes the wife. The husband, armed with a poker, kills him. The gossips arrive but before they enter the two hastily place the dead man's body on the couch and throw a rug over it. The crowd tells the husband what they have seen but he refuses to believe it. When they have gone the wife and husband quickly pack their things and take to the trail. After a terrible journey they come at last to a cabin, inhabited by a whiskey runner who is plying his illegal trade under the very eyes of the revenue officers.

Martha gives him the gold and he arranges with one of his men to take the sick man to Seattle the next morning. Bidding each other good-bye, he leaves his wife at the cabin, while he proceeds with his companion to the city, where his only chance for life lies.

Martha takes the place of the whiskey runner's helper and charmed by her simplicity and sweetness, the revenue officers are thrown off their track. Six months later she receives a note from her husband saying he is entirely cured and is on his way to again rejoin her. Overjoyed, she starts off to take the whiskey bottles to their hiding places, but is detected by the revenue officers. They follow her. In her race back to the cabin she pushes one of their guns into the camp fire. The cartridges explode and she is mortally wounded. The revenue officers carry her body to the whiskey runner's shack. Here her husband eagerly awaits his wife. Wild with grief and rage at his wife being snatched from his arms after they struggle so desperately to live for each other, he jumps at the whiskey runner. The strain is too much and he falls dead. The next day the revenue officers silently mark the graves with two tiny crosses, and then lead the whiskey runner off to jail.

A TALE OF THE DESERT (Mar. 22).—Little Helen is the pet of the mining camp of which her father is the leader. One day her father catches an Indian worker stealing and, giving him a sound beating, drives him out of the camp. The thief swears vengeance and the next day makes off with little Helen. The baby's absence is discovered. The miners search all day and night without results. Meanwhile, the Indian has carried Helen to his squaw. Despite the ill treatment she grows up to be a beautiful girl, loved by the squaw, who protects her as much as possible. Pierre sells the girl to an Indian chief. She fights wildly against going. The squaw, grieving at the treatment Helen received, follows the chief and, while he sleeps, frees the girl. Supporting the frightened and half conscious Helen, she makes her way to the girl's former home and after knocking on the door, leaves her outside. The father and mother, grown old and gray, are overjoyed at the return of their daughter, and when she tells her story they all give silent thanks for her miraculous escape. Off in the hills the Indian woman, who has learned to love Helen, silently rocks back and forth in solitude.

REX.

THE KIDNAPPED PUGILIST (Mar. 19).—Jimmie is the son of a country blacksmith. Matching his strength against that of his playmates, he soon becomes conscious of his own power. He defends the small boy against the big boy and finally administers a hearty "trimming" to Kelly, the town bully. Some prize fight promoters drift into town. They become interested in Jimmie and Kelly as prospective ring stars and take them to the city, where they are placed in training quarters.

Two years pass and Hazel, Jimmie's sweetheart, is now in the city working in a department store. In a few days the big fight between Jimmie and Kelly is scheduled to take place. Kelly's manager is afraid of Jimmie and hires two ruffians to kidnap him. Jimmie is abducted and held prisoner in a barn.

The time for the big fight arrives. Hazel, anxious to witness the bout, dresses in masculine attire and is admitted. The referee announces that if Jimmie does not show up within half an hour, the fight will be called off. Hazel learns of Jimmie's whereabouts through overhearing a conversation between Kelly's manager and the ruffians. She hurries to the place of his imprisonment and releases Jimmie. He arrives at the ringside an instant before the bout is called off. The big fight takes place and Kelly meets complete and ignominious defeat.

UNIVERSAL IKE.

UNIVERSAL IKE HAS ONE FOOT IN THE GRAVE (Mar. 17).—Universal Ike is badly treated by his nagging wife. She not only refuses to allow him to go out for a time with the boys, but she even compels him to help with the washing. In addition to all these things she is a naughty, naughty woman, because she harbors a soft spot in her heart for Sheriff Butternut. To get even with her Ike takes one too many drinks. While in this pleasant condition he runs across a bargain sale on second-hand coffins. He then decides that he will further punish his wife by dying. A friend is in on the hoax and Ike is taken home in the coffin. His sorrowful wife allows herself to be intimately consoled by Sheriff Butternut, and she even promises to wed him as soon as the funeral is over. Ike watches his own funeral. Finally, at the graveyard, he frightens all the mourners away, pushes his wife and the sheriff into the grave which was intended for him and buries them alive.

FRONTIER.

COLONEL CUSTARD'S LAST STAND (Mar. 19). Colonel Custard is awakened from his afternoon sleep by a bugle blowing in his ear. The bugler proves to be his daughter's lover. The irate Colonel hurls a bucket out of the window at the intruder, but instead the bucket falls on the head of Chief Standing Cow, who returns to his people and invites them to the war path. Meanwhile, the boob bugler has taken refuge from the Colonel's wrath in a mortar canon. The Indians arrive and a terrific fight begins. Against her father's wishes Molly sneaks out of the fort to go for help. The Indians see her and pursue, chasing her in a deserted cabin, where, unable to break in the door, they start to burn the cabin down. At the fort the soldiers fire the mortar. The boob is shot into space, and lands on the top of the cabin in which Molly is. He kills the Indians and then the two retreat to the fort. There, too, the buglar puts the Indians to rout.

THE SHERIFF'S DEPUTY (Mar. 21).—Arthur Bronson courts Bill Gavins' daughter, Edythe, and the two become engaged. Bill Gavin has been sheriff for twenty years and he allows that he is good for one more term. But when he learns that his daughter's fiance, Arthur, is also to run for the position, he becomes furious and insists that his daughter break with Arthur. Election day comes. Arthur has been warned by Edythe, that the defeat of her father will mean the defeat of their love, but he has refused to withdraw from the contest. But at the polls he casts his vote for Bill Gavin, a fact that he tells Edythe, and that evening when Gavin learns that he has been elected by a single vote, and is reminded that his opponent voted for him, his feelings change considerably toward Arthur. In fact, he chooses Arthur as his deputy, and Slim Jenkins, Gavin's crony, paints a new sign for the sheriff's office, which reads: "Gavin and Bronson—Sheriffs."

NESTOR.

THE WAY OF A WOMAN (Mar. 18).—Dorothy is a city girl who has chosen to teach school in the backwoods. Perrie is a product of the backwoods, a man who will allow no one to cross him in the most trivial matter, a man in whom the baser elements of character are predominant. The girl flirts with him. He proposes to her. She rejects his suit. All his fighting qualities are aroused. She is to leave for the railway station the following week and meet her mother. She consents to Perrie accompanying her. On their way to the station he takes her by main force and carries her into the mountains to a hut.

While he is going for water a tree in his path falls and breaks his leg. He drags himself to the hut. The girl has fled to an adjoining room.

Now that the girl is in his power he is ashamed of himself. He begins to think of decency. He goes into the adjoining room, and finding her asleep, covers her and retires. In the meantime her mother has missed her at the station. A search is instigated. With the coming of dawn the girl awakens and goes into the next room. She finds Pierre chilled and in agony on the floor. She drags him to the bed and administers to him. They hear the searching party approaching. Pierre tells her that she is saved and that he will be lynched. She goes to the door and waves the men back. "We were on our way to be married," she tells them, "and Pierre broke his leg."

THOSE PERSISTENT OLD MAIDS (Mar. 20).—Governor Russell flatly refuses the request of a delegation of suffragettes. The suffragettes embarrass him while he attends the theater with his son, Eddie, and Victoria, his prospective daughter-in-law. When the suffragettes find these methods of no avail they appeal to Gibby Gabby, a fancy dancer. They beg the dancer to aid them in kidnapping the governor's son. Gibby Gabby becomes a party to the conspiracy and drops a note to Eddie inviting him to take tea with her the following morning. The young man determines to take this final fling before he is married. Victoria learns of his plans and follows him to the dancer's apartments.

Gibby Gabby doses Eddie with a sleeping powder. He is then placed in a trunk and turned over to the suffragettes. Victoria tells the governor and he hires Spy'em, a detective, to rescue Eddie. In transferring the trunk to the train, the suffragettes get the wrong baggage check. When they open the trunk, instead of their victim, they find ladies' wearing apparel and a card reading, "Miss Mary Skinner, Rose apartments, San Diego." All hurry to this address. Miss Skinner discovers Eddie. He escapes into an adjoining room. Spy'em enters. Upon hearing Miss Skinner's approach, he climbs into the trunk. Eddie escapes and promises never again to be led astray by any woman, except Victoria.

POWERS.

HAWKEYE AND THE CHEESE MYSTERY (Mar. 16).—The great Hawkeye reads that a criminally insane lunatic has escaped from an asylum. Forthwith Hawkeye arms himself, summons his "shadow" and the two go in search of the madman. In the meantime Pansy Buttermilk has read of the lunatic's escape and engenders the fear within herself that he may take it into his head to call on her. Clarence, Pansy's "intended," is spotted by Hawkeye and shadowed to Pansy's house. When he becomes aware that he is being followed he takes note of Hawkeye and concludes that the great detective is the lunatic. He communicates his fear to Pansy, and the panic begins. The cook has placed some cheese in the window to ripen. The detective scents it and concludes that the lunatic has murdered his victim and buried the body under the house. Hawkeye obtains the aid of the police, and they break into the house. The suspicious scent is explained. In fact, everything is explained with the exception of why "Hawkeye" and his "shadow" are there. Hawkeye, with his "shadow," is led away to prison.

HANDS INVISIBLE (Mar. 20)—Helen Walters has expensive tastes which the narrow means of her father cannot satisfy. To obtain money she forges his name to a check. The imposition is discovered. In her extremity, the girl confesses her crime to her brother. Moved, he takes the blame for the forgery upon himself. The father, man of old-fashioned ideas, allows his son to be sent to prison. A few years later the girl is married to the district attorney. Her brother escapes and seeks out his sister. It is night and as he enters the house the attorney beholds a stranger embracing his wife. He breaks into the room, but the escaped felon has had time to hide. The wife denies the accusation of her husband. In a fit of jealous rage he chokes her to death. The brother returns to the room and tells the district attorney that the dead woman is his sister. Then a strange thing happens. The attorney becomes pursued with the horror of his crime—he cannot control the muscles of his fingers—they repeat and repeat the action of strangling his innocent wife, until he dies—a victim of his imagination.

CRYSTAL.

DAZZLE'S BLACK EYE (Mar. 17).—Dazzle and his wife have a quarrel at the breakfast table. While lighting a cigarette, he sets his newspaper on fire and burns his fingers. His wife's aunt visits them and makes matters worse by insisting that he suffers no pain. She is a Christian Scientist. Dazzle resolves on a hunting trip and writes a friend in Baltimore to wire his wife that business will detain him there for three days. He goes hunting and mistakes a man with a fur coat for a bear, shoots him and gets severely beaten. He gets in other trouble and comes home with a black eye. His wife comes up to his room and opens the door. He claims she hit him in the eye with it. Later, however, the fake telegram arrives, and his deception is discovered.

BALDY BELMONT NEARLY A HERO (Mar. 17).—Baldy loves the widow Smith. She makes eyes at the handsome policeman on the beat. Baldy hires a tough guy to play a burglar and enter her house. He dresses as a policeman and goes in after him. Mrs. Smith sees the burglar and runs out for a cop. Meanwhile, Baldy and the fake burglar have a furious tussle. Just as he is about to drag his prisoner off, the real cop arrives and both of them are arrested for unlawful entry and dragged off to jail. Baldy lost another chance to be a hero.

THE FAT AND THIN OF IT (Mar. 22).—Mr. Stout, who weighs 350, and his wife, who weighs 100, read the advertisement of Prof. Biff Conners that he can make fat people thin and thin people fat. So also do Mr. and Mrs. Slim, who weigh 110 and 400 respectively. They visit the professor's and there he and his pretty assistant, Pearl, induce all four of them to take up a course. The professor has a way of manipulating the scales to suit his purpose and his clients believe they are either [illegible]. In the course of training at the gymnasium, young Mr. Slim puts a pound dumbell in each of his boxing gloves and proceeds to box with Mr. Stout. He knocks him out. Others interfere and are accorded the same treatment. The [illegible] comes in and he gets the same dose. Pearl runs out for a cop and the minion of the law is accorded the same treatment. Eventually all is straightened out and the fat and thin couples go home, resolved that they can do nothing to help their condition and resume.

THE SILVER LOVING CUP (Two Parts—Mar. 19).—Dr. Harvey is a celebrated surgeon. His wife, Estella, cares more for pleasure than for home. Their child, Nora, is adored by the father, while the mother can scarcely find time to notice her. We first see Harvey in the hospital, consulted by all. Lister, a friend of the wife's calls and takes her out to a bridge party. The next evening Harvey is presented with a silver loving cup by some of his fellow surgeons in honor of a wonderful discovery he made which will cure those suffering from cancer. Meanwhile, Lister and a party of friends take the wife to a private gambling den. The wife plays and loses and borrows from Lister. Harvey leaves the banquet hall and returns home. His wife is out. The baby girl runs to her daddy and asks about the big new cup. To please her he drinks out of the cup with the child, explaining how he got it. His wife returns with a party of friends, including Lister. After the friends and Lister have gone, the husband, suspecting too much intimacy between his wife and Lister, upbraids her. She promises to change her way if he will take her out personally.

Harvey tries to keep up with his wife's pace, neglecting his patients the while. A big operation is on at the hospital and Harvey is at a ball. A messenger is sent. Harvey leaves and returns home for his case. He finds his wife and Lister, who have preceded him, believing he was going to the hospital. An awful scene follows. Harvey leaves for the hospital, only to learn that his place has been filled by another. He returns home. His wife has left with Lister. A fire is discovered up stairs. The child accidentally set her room on fire and is mortally burned. He wishes to give her medicine. She will take it only in the loving cup. The child dies and Harvey goes out to a different life, his cup of bitterness filled. Time passes. Harvey, having lost all, seeks solace attending to the poor. His wife, having parted with Lister, has found the road long and hard. Harvey has made some remarkable cures among the poor and in time is induced to go and operate a strange case in the society he once lived. This party is Lister's father. Harvey learns of it just before the operation, but carries the operation through successfully. Then it is that Harvey learns from Lister that the wife broke with him in the early stages of their infatuation. Harvey is re-established in the hospital. One day a case is brought in on a stretcher. Harvey is asked to attend it. He finds the victim is his wife. It is a case of starvation. In the end we find them both drinking out of the silver loving cup.

THE PATH OF GENIUS Two parts—Mar. 6).—John Ruskin, an unknown art student, penniless, tramping over England, stops at a tavern and tells the innkeeper that he will paint him a new sign for his tavern if he will give him something to eat. Ruskin meets the innkeeper's daughter and falls in love with her, but the father drives him away. Later, the old man dies and the girl and her mother are turned from the tavern by the old man's creditors. They go to the city, taking the sign painted by Ruskin, who is now a well known and successful artist. Mildred takes the painting to an old art dealer, who recognizes the signature of Ruskin. He obtains the girl's address, and takes the painting to Ruskin to ask him if it is an original. Ruskin, who has been longing for Mildred, pays the art dealer for the painting and asks for Mildred's address. Mildred is surprised and pleased to find that he has not forgotten her, but is more surprised to learn that he wishes to marry one in her station in life.

BRONCHO.

THE RELIC (2 parts—Mar. 25).—Malcomb Ross, a very capable Shakespearian actor now old and starving, applies for a position in a revival of King Lear. The only thing that is open is a minor part, which at first he refuses, but when he realizes his hunger, he consents to take the position. During the play a drop falls upon the star playing King Lear, and the actor playing the fool, who had played the same part with Ross some years previously, informs the manager, John Benton, that Ross can take the part. The manager consents and Ross makes a success. The next day, as he does not call at the office as he has promised to do, the manager hunts him up. He finds him dying, and the landlady and one of the actors living in the same house, tell him that Ross has been starving for days.

DOMINO.

THE SILENT MESSENGER (2 parts—Mar. 25).—The story is laid in a little Italian village, the chief industry of which is a large stone quarry, of which Pietro Giovanti is foreman. Pietro is noted for his strength and as a consequence is the bully of the town; he betrays little Maria Rosso, the pet and pride of her father and brother, and when the minister reproves him for his act, asking him if he has no respect for the teachings of the Bible, Pietro replies that he will have to explain certain foolish fables told in the Bible before he will believe. Maria cannot bear the thought of facing her shame and kills herself. Her father and brother vow vengeance and enlist the sympathies of the whole village. They arm themselves with sticks and stones and go after Pietro, who takes refuge in Dr. Bossini's laboratory. Dr. Bossini has devoted his life to the study of bacteria. When Pietro rushes into his room exhausted and out of breath, he quickly grabs a glass containing, as he thinks, water, but which in realty contains enough spinal meningitis germs to kill a dozen men. The crowd appears at the door and demand that the doctor deliver Pietro to them, but he tells them he has gone. They find him later. "An infinitesimal germ had drained his great strength, the spirit of devils, those silent messengers of death."

THANHOUSER.

KATHLEEN, THE IRISH ROSE (2 parts—Mar. 10).—This story tells of the experiences of an Irish lassie who loved and was loved by a young peasant named Terrance. Matters were complicated, however, by the fact that the squire of the village fell in love with her and paid her much attention. It struck the girl that it would be fine to be a lady and she let her thoughts dwell upon the luxuries that wealth would bring, but fortunately for her she had a dream one day which showed her very clearly, at least so she believed, that her future with the squire would be dark and tragical. In her dreams she saw herself almost the victim of a mock marriage and wept over Terrance who, through no fault of his own, but simply because he tried to help her, was convicted of murder and sent to the gallows. She awoke with a scream and decided that her humble lover was the man to rely upon, so when the squire next called she gave him the door, and when Terrance appeared he found waiting for him a blushing, loving Kathleen Mavourneen.

PRINCESS.

BILLY'S RUSE (Mar. 13).—Boyd has never skated, but he'll try anything for Muriel's sake, and Billy professes to be a champion fancy skate artist. Billy has a "chewing match" with Fanny, his wife, and while she entertains a neighbor, Billy looks through a window and listens to the call of the ice. He sees what a terrible time Muriel is having in trying to teach Boyd to skate. She looks good to him, and he offers to teach Boyd to skate, and offers himself as an escort. Muriel, not knowing he is married, has a delightful time. Fanny, in the meantime, parts with her caller and discovers Billy's absence. She sees him from the house displaying his ability to Muriel. She goes after him, and after exciting mix-ups and eccentric comedy, Billy gets chased, and finding Fanny some skater, realizes his only means of escape is through a fisherman's hole in the ice, and he goes into it. It is only after apparently given up as lost that Billy appears, but he enjoys the scene from another hole. When he makes his appearance Fanny promises to let by-gones be by-gones.

AMERICAN.

A MODERN FREE-LANCE (Mar. 16).—Robert Randall, a reporter, writing a play when he should be at his work, gets himself in the habit of arriving at the office late and in consequence finds himself out of work. In the meantime, Necia, his sweetheart, shows preference for his rival, Desmond, but he finds consolation in thinking of Mary Rollins, the little waitress at the restaurant where he eats. Receiving his pay from the newspaper office, he spends it all in food, which he takes to his room, and locking himself in, works until he finishes his play. After considerable trouble he finds a theatrical manager who gives his manuscript consideration.

Finding himself hungry, he goes to his former eating place, but not having money, he cannot get food. The little waitress, Mary, who has been friendly to him, would help, but the manager refuses. After leaving the restaurant, he is so weak from lack of food that he can only stagger to a seat in a park nearby, where he is seen by Mary. She succeeds in sending something to eat to him, for which he is very grateful and writes a message of thanks to her. Later he gets a chance to help her and by so doing is knocked down and so badly injured as to require medical treatment and detention in a hospital for about three weeks. In the meantime his play is accepted and makes a great sensation. Through an incident in the theatrical office, his address is destroyed and he does not know of the success of his play or of its acceptance until the day of his leaving the hospital, when he sees a notice in the paper. This brings prosperous times

Progressive Exhibitors Are Getting in Line for Our Feature Service

They are learning that we mean business. They are discovering that we have more to offer than any other exchange in the United States.

They appreciate our policy of guaranteeing exclusive rights—of not allowing anyone to have our features who can be consistently regarded as a competitor.

Hundreds have attended our complimentary exhibitions at the Academy of Music—Fourteenth Street and Irving Place—and after seeing our big money-getting features, have booked them.

Scores upon scores have visited our headquarters at 130 West Forty-Sixth Street, where we have built two beautiful little theatres for the special benefit of exhibitors.

We ask exhibitors to see before they book because we have confidence in our three and four reel features—know they will put money into any box office.

Don't wait too long. While you delay another may get ahead of you. Best way is to ask us to enroll your name among those who wish to investigate our plan.

Then you will have plenty of time to make up your mind.

You incur no obligation by asking us to reserve exclusive rights for you. If we cannot convince you that it is to your best interests to book our features, you will have lost nothing.

to him and his prosperity. Mary, who has been in constant attendance with him at the hospital, is not forgotten. With his success also comes Neera, but this time it is his turn to have the choice and it falls to May, whom Robert has learned to love.

THE COMING OF THE PADRES Mar. 18).—When, in 1782, the Rev. Junipero Serra celebrated the first mass in Santa Barbara he little dreamed that almost a century and a half later the incident would be perpetuated to posterity by moving pictures. At the bi-centennial of the birth of Father Serra, recently held at Santa Barbara, a fac-simile of the "Hermita," in which the founder had celebrated mass, was erected and used for solemn High Mass.

The religious rites are simply incident to the dramatic production, portraying the conflict that raged between civil and military authorities. The costuming is historically correct and has been passed upon by competent authorities. Traveler and student alike will be interested in this absorbing production. The Santa Barbara Mission was not completed during the life of Father Serra and proved a great disappointment to him, but his confidence was so great, that the work was taken up by his loyal successors and executed most faithfully.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Chapter 8—Mar. 9).—In the eighth reel of "Our Mutual Girl," Margaret and Mrs. Knickerbocker, her aunt, see Riverside Drive and the city in a snow storm. Children bobsledding, skiing and skating along Riverside Drive are shown; also scenes showing the total suspension of traffic. On their way home Margaret watches the pupils of a great public school as they are dismissed. Among the hundreds of school children are a score or more of crippled and deformed children who are taken to their homes in a carry-all.

Mrs. Knickerbocker agrees with her niece that it would be a splendid idea to dress up a number of dolls for the crippled girls, so a visit is paid to a Fifth Avenue toy shop. Margaret takes the dolls home and, assisted by her aunt and a maid, dresses them up in beautiful gowns. Among the dolls is a life-size manikin, which Margaret keeps for her own amusement. That night she dreams that she herself has been transformed into a doll and that her aunt and maid are dressing her in lingerie and pantalettes of the crinoline period.

CAUGHT IN THE WEB (Mar. 11).—James Martin dies after drinking a cup of poisoned coffee. Circumstantial evidence accuses the dead man's son, and he is arrested for the crime. Young Martin's sweetheart tries to prove his innocence, and succeeds in paving the way for the detectives to solve the mystery.

The flat above the Martin apartment is occupied by counterfeiters, their tools and chemicals being hidden underneath the flooring of a room directly over the dining room of the Martins. One of the gang accidentally overturns a bottle of deadly poisonous acid. This fluid soaks through the plastering of the flat below and drips into the coffee, which kills the elder Martin. Through the discovery of the counterfeiters the mystery is cleared and an innocent man freed.

RED, THE MEDIATOR (Mar. 14).—Aloysius Walsh, alias Red, is a tough messenger boy. One day he is chosen by fate to be the medium of communication between Hubert Holworthy and Miss Wetmore, two lovers who have quarreled. As Red secretly reads the lover's letters, he is aware that only false pride keeps them apart. His sympathies are aroused and he decides to be the mediator. So he lies to Holworthy and tells him that Miss Wetmore has sent for him to come to her at once. Holworthy joyfully hastens to her.

Red satisfied that he has done his duty is on his way back to the office when he is waylaid and injured seriously by a big bully of a boy with whom he had previously fought. Red does not recover consciousness until revived by the doctor in the hospital. He then asks that Holworthy and Miss Wetmore be sent for.

Of course, Holworthy receives a cold reception when he, uninvited, calls on Miss Wetmore, and the breach between them is growing wider, but just then Miss Wetmore gets a message over the 'phone saying the boy had been badly injured. They have a mutual interest in the boy who has been so sympathetic and hasten to the hospital. When they arrive Miss Wetmore is easily persuaded by Red to let Holworthy replace the ring on her finger. Red is joyful that his efforts as mediator have not been in vain, but the excitement has been too much, and he falls back on his pillow, exhausted. The doctor looks very grave, then covers the boy's face with the sheet.

BEAUTY FILM.

THE GIRL WHO DARED Mar. 18).—Maggie, [illegible] the children of a father who is a worthless member of a questionable society. Lill and Frank are no better than their parrent and follow his valueless creed, but Maggie, though reared under the worst influences, remains unsullied and at an early opportunity quits her family and starts life for herself. Her advancement is rapid and though threatened and denounced by her brother, is equal to the situation and finally is loved and won by her employer who repays her "devoted" brother with a beating delivered in advanced style and an imperative order for his absence.

MAJESTIC.

HIS FIRST LOVE (Mar. 10).—A young husband paces back and forth in the library, waiting impatiently for the nurse who appears in the doorway and calls him. She places a tiny bundle in his arms. He is overjoyed at the sight of the little son, and after giving her the child, he rushes to the 'phone and calls up the club-house. The boys at the club receive the message with pleasure and excitement, all except one, a grouchy bachelor. He has no use for babies and refuses to go to see the new arrival. However, the other boys go. They return to the club full of glowing descriptions of the little one. The old bachelor becomes provoked and almost quarrels with them for silence. In the argument he says: "There is no such thing as a pretty baby." They all argue and in his wrath he makes a wager of $500 to a real, live pretty child, if they will show it to him. One of the young men makes a plan to which they all eagerly agree.

In a poor little home a young wife is preparing supper while a little three-year-old child plays in the doorway. She springs up to greet her father, who returns from work. While eating, the wife timidly hands him a letter which came. He realizes what it contains the minute he sees it. The third month's payment is over-due on their little home and the owner gives them only a week to make it up or get out. The young husband tries to borrow from a friend but without success, and the date mentioned in the letter comes and they are still without necessary money. The wife sees a notice in the paper which reads: "Babies! Babies! Babies! $500 will be awarded the prettiest, etc."

The young couple decide to try to win the prize and together they go in to the little one, who lies asleep in her crib. The wife suddenly realizes that they have no money to buy a pretty dress for her and almost gives up in despair, when an idea comes to her. She goes to the dresser and takes out a pair of her own stockings, much to the surprise of her husband, and laughingly tells him to wait and see. Another scene shows a rich home. A little girl is being dressed in ribbons and laces and the mother is more concerned over the child's clothes than the child herself.

The time for the exhibition comes. In a room several maids attend the children who are being brought in. Outside of the club-house, the poor mother hugs the baby to her and enters timidly. The baby is wrapped in a long shawl and some of the other mothers look at them in surprise. In the large reception room a stage has been erected in the corner of the room, behind which hang heavy dark curtains. The old bachelor sits in the back of the audience and is as grouchy as ever. The curtains are drawn as the show commences and a little girl stands on a pedestal, dressed in laces and ribbons like a doll. The people clap, but the old bachelor is disgusted and says, "too much overdress." Another child is shown and still he is dissatisfied. The third time the curtains are drawn there is a hush over them all for a moment. There stands a little girl, her tiny form encased in black tights; her plump high chest and dimpled arms and limbs contrast strongly with the dark curtains behind her. As the old bachelor looks at her, his curiosity is aroused and he starts to go down the aisle to where she stands on the pedestal. As he nears her she slowly puts out her arms to him and smiles. He is fascinated with her and much to his embarrassment and to the others' amusement, she puts her arms around his neck and kisses him. He is won over by her sweet ways. He gives her the money she won for the prize, and she is carried home. In the little home the parents eagerly await the coming of the owner of the house so as to pay him the money and have the papers signed, which will give them the home. The owner comes, and he happens to be the bachelor. He is surprised to see the little baby that won the prize. He signs the papers and everything is happy. And thereafter the baby is his little love forever.

WORLD'S TOUR

IN SIX REELS

These pictures were taken by the Pathe Freres Company at a cost of over one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000), and represent scenes, incidents and dramatic happenings in all parts of the world. The publicity given this wonderful trip by the Press in every City, Village and Hamlet, makes this picture one of great value to State Right buyers. The receptions tendered to the tourists by the Rulers of the different countries, the presence of England's King at the game played in London, graphically depicted upon the screen, scenes and action plays which took place in various cities of the United States, in Japan, China, Manila, Australia, India, Egypt, and Europe, combine to make this the greatest moving picture proposition for State Right buyers on the market. The fact that it is booked for an indefinite run in five of the leading theatres of New York City will give you some idea of its merit. Remember, this is not a picture for baseball fans alone. There are millions of lovers of baseball, but these pictures will appeal not only to them, but to men, women and children in all walks of life, because they are ENTERTAINING, EDUCATIONAL and INTERESTING.

THE MOONSHINER'S DAUGHTER (Mar. 14).—Gus Whitmere, an old moonshiner, living in a wild and secluded section of the Blue Ridge Mountains, has a daughter, Grace, for whose hand Tom Cole, one of Whitmere's "regular customers," is an ardent suitor. Grace, however, does not encourage his suit and her father refuses to urge her to marry someone she does not love. Tom, having filled his jug from Whitmere's cellar, rides down the trail. As he is riding along with the jug hidden in a sack of corn, he meets a revenue officer, who, suspecting the contents of the sack, proceeds to investigate. While his back is turned, Tom, fearing arrest, takes a quick shot at him and dashes back the way he had come. The officer is shot in the arm and after binding his wound, opens the sack and discovers the jug. He then mounts his horse, and, taking the jug with him, rides off in the opposite direction from that taken by Tom. In the meantime, Grace has gone to spend a few days with her chum, Minnie Hammond. Bert, Minnie's brother, and Commander of the revenue officers, is at home when Grace arrives, and they are at once attracted to each other. That afternoon a messenger brings him a note from headquarters stating that Hendricks, his lieutenant, has reported with a broken arm and news of moonshine in Devil's Fork. Bert dashes off, after handing the note to Minnie, who shows it to Grace. Grace at once suspects that her father is involved and determines to reach him before the revenue officers. She confides in Minnie, who has brought her horse, and after an affectionate farewell, Grace rides for her mountain home.

On arriving at headquarters, Bert finds Hendricks with his arm in a sling and is shown the jug of whiskey. He at once orders his men to saddle and leads them for Devil's Fork. The moonshiners have been warned, however, for after attempting to kill Hendricks, Cole rode back to Whitmere's and told him of the encounter. The entire family and Cole prepare for war. Bert and his men ride up and Bert demands that the still be destroyed. Whitmere refuses and the firing is about to begin when Grace dashes up the trail and rides fearlessly between the combatants. Bert then tells Whitmere that he loves Grace and intends to marry her and that, for her sake, he wil not molest them if they will forfeit their still and pledge themselves to make no more moonshines. Whitmere is urged to accept by Grace and his wife, while Cole, jealous of Bert, demands that they fight it out. Whitmere is undecided until Grace, throwing her arms about his neck, begs him to accept for her sake. He then shakes hands with Bert and all but Cole make the required pledge. Cole, mad with jealousy, throws up his gun with the intention of shooting Bert. Before he can fire, Grace leaps forward and strikes him on the wrist with her riding quirt, causing the shot to fly wild. He is then overcome and bound. Bert, turning to Grace, says: "Sweetheart, you saved my life." They embrace while her family smile and his men give a rousing cheer.

KENNEDY FEATURES, INC.

JESS (Four parts).—Silas Croft, an Englishman, has taken up farming in South Africa and has been unusually successful. His sister in England, ill, widowed, and left with two little girls—Jess and Bess—starts for South Africa to make her home with him. The sister, however, is stricken with death just after landing from the steamer and the two little girls are sent on to the brother. Jess is the older of the two children and when the mother dies she entrusts the care and happiness of the younger child to the sister, scarcely older. Gladly received and tenderly reared by their uncle, Silas Croft, the girls grow to beautiful and gracious young womanhood on his farm.

Sixteen years after their arrival in South Africa, John Neil, a young Englishman who has been an army officer, comes from England to learn South Africa farming and selects Silas Croft as his schoolmaster. Both Jess and Bess fall in love with John Neil. Neil really loves Jess, but she, believing herself bound by the promise given her dead mother, makes John thing she cares nothing for him and goes on a visit to Pretoria, then the principal city of South Africa, so that John may forget her and turn to Bess. Shortly after the departure of Bess for Pretoria occurs the first revolution of the Boers against the British Government. Bess has an admirer, Frank Mueller, a wealthy and influential Boer, whom she hates and fears. Mueller knows that Bess is in love with John and plans to get rid of him. Pretoria, held by the English, is surrounded by Boer troops and Mueller, now a high officer of the Boer Army, writes to Jess that her uncle is ill and needs her. John Neil has gone to Pretoria and Mueller is sure that he will accompany Jess on the trip home. Mueller sends a pass and two of his men to act as an escort. Jess and Neil start, but once outside of the British lines, they are taken captive by Mueller, who laughs at the way they have fallen into his simple trap. Mueller attemps to kill both, but both escape. While in danger Jess has confessed her love for John.

Now upon the screen is shown the fighting which took place around Pretoria. For week after week the Boers besieged and the British defended the city. The fighting is shown with strict regard for historical accuracy. In 1877 the Transvaal was annexed to Great Britain and in December, of 1880, occurred the rising of the Boers. This was rather an internecine war than a rebellion. Many Boers took the side of England and not a few Englishmen fought on the side of the Boers. The fighting, for the most part, was done by volunteers on both sides, men without uniforms and with but little discipline, but trained to the use of arms since childhood and inured to hardship. At Majuba Hill the English regular soldiers met with a crushing defeat at the hands of the Boers, and in March, of 1881, a treaty was concluded which left the Boers practically independent. Failing in his plan to kill John Neil, Mueller captures Silas Croft and gives Bess the alternative of seeing her uncle die or of marrying him. She chooses to save her uncle, but before the marriage is performed Jess surprises Mueller, while he is asleep, and stabs him to death, releasing her uncle and Bess.

Flying, Jess rejoins John in a cave near the farm. John is asleep when she returns to him and does not awaken until morning and when he does awake Jess is dead of exhaustion. The British troops arrive, saving Bess and her uncle and John Neil as well. Bess and John are married and return to England. The drama closes with a view of the English home of the Neil's, which is all happiness, but in a tableau it is shown that no matter what comes, Jess will never be forgotten by either her sister, to whom she gave all, or by John Neil, who loved her very truly.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

THE PIRATES OF THE PLAINS (Three Parts).—Jim and Joe Webster, who, though brothers, are as different as day and night. Jim is an honest and respected ranchman, while Joe is the ringleader of a gang of desperate horse thieves. At the State Fair, Jim has won the championship broncho riding title of the world, for which he has received a handsome silver-mounted saddle. He becomes engaged to Nell Owen, the pretty daughter of a prosperous stockman. One of Owen's post riders discovers a gang of horse thieves on the ranch, and gives the alarm.

Joe, their leader, breaks his saddle. Desirous of joining his gang, he takes his brother's horse and heads for the Mexican border. The ranch hands give chase, hoping to catch the rustlers before they reach the international boundry. In a running fight, Joe kills the sheriff, but has the horse which he is riding shot from under him. The posse recovers the saddle, and captures Jim without a struggle. He is saved by Nell, who demands he be given a trial. Later, he is convicted and sentenced to be hung. On the day set for the hanging, Joe is mortally wounded and confesses of his guilt to Nell. She reaches the prison yard in time to prevent Jim's execution.

APEX.

THE BATTLE IN THE CLOUDS (Three Parts).—Through the good offices of Detective Hayes, Miss Dennison, the one-time leader of the "Black 13," and in those days known as "Slim Jack," has become a reformed woman, and is now his constant and devoted companion and assistant. One day she is seated in the famous Marble Lounge of the Esplanade Hotel reading the morning paper when she is unpleasantly surprised by John Verden, a former associate, who is concealed behind the palm decorations, adopting a disguise. At once she suspects mischief, and watches. As Verden pulls out a pocket mirror, he accidentally drops a letter, and the moment he is gone Miss Dennison secures the paper, which contains the startling news that an attempt is to be made by the gang to steal the plans of the new-found "Million Mine" when the directors of the company meet on the roof of "The Esplanade," at 9 o'clock the same evening, to discuss proceedings. Realizing the importance of the discovery, Miss Dennison at once informs Hayes, who enlists sympathy of the hotel manager to gain access to the meeting, which he attends in disguise. The secret plan of the richest mine in the world is so small that it can only be read through a microscope, and whilst it is under the instrument, the waiter, who is none other than Corley, a member of the gang, causes a diversion by feigning a sudden attack of illness. Whilst the attention of those present is turned upon Corley, Verden emerges from under the table and removes the priceless plan from under the microscope. A moment later the chairman discovers the theft, and consternation rigns amongst the assembled officials of the company.

Hayes arrests the waiter on charge of complicity, and the board of directors of the "Million Mine" entrusts the detective with the task of recovering the stolen plans. Hayes removes Corley in an automobile, but the gang obtain a motor lorry, and with this heavy vehicle crash into the detective's car to rescue their comrade. Not to be defeated, Hayes gives chase, but as he runs full pelt after the lorry is lassoed by one of the thieves and only escapes death by cutting the rope after he has been dragged some distance. Sorely injured he returns home to make a fresh start. Meanwhile, Miss Dennison receives a visit from Verden, who endeavors to persuade her to help the "Black 13." Miss Dennison, however, has done with the old life, and whilst she assents to Verden's proposition, she telephones Hayes about it, and informs him that she will follow Verden in the disguise of a Chinese paper seller, and will make chalk marks on the pavement from 45th street so that he may be able to pick up the trail. Miss Dennison succeeds in tracking down Verden, but unluckily is captured. Hayes arrives and rescues her by crossing a plank from the houses on the opposite side, helping them to jump from the window on to a passing bus. As the bus crosses a viaduct Hayes sees Verden below and makes a series of daring leaps in order to follow him before he is out of sight.

Knowing that he is being shadowed, Verden enters a motor car and drives away, and believing he has shaken off his pursuer, enters Old Solomon's, the pawnbroker's shop, where the gang adopt their various disguises. Hayes is close upon his heels, now disguised as a customer, and when Verden leaves, Hayes tears off his disguise, and leaving the astonished Solomon behind, pursues his man. He is, however, too late, but Miss Dennison, his trusty lieutenant, has seen Corley, and shadowing him, discovers that he and Verden are off to the gold fields with the plan of the mine, and that they are going to dig the gold with the help of a band of Indians. She immediately communicates the news to Hayes, she herself pursuing the thieves on a motorcycle. Unfortunately for her, however, her machine runs away and plunges into a river. Dazed and hurt, she crawls to the bank and falls exhausted on the ground, where she is found by one of Verden's Indians. Verden has her locked in a hut and sets it on fire. Burning her bonds over a flaming beam, Miss Dennison escapes, and taking one of the horses tethered close by, makes off, hotly pursued by the Indians. An outpost camp gives her shelter, and a sharp fight ensues. The struggle goes in the Indians' favor until a scout breaks through the enemy's lines and fetches reinforcements from the next camp. The Indians are routed, and John Verden receives a severe wound. At the last moment, before the Indians beat a hasty retreat, Corley takes the plan from Verden's pocket, and mounting his horse, makes away. Hayes has arrived in the meantime by aeroplane and hears the story of the fight. He bends down over the wounded man, but Verden ironically exclaims, "Too late, Hayes, Corley's got the plan." The detective loses no time in mounting his monoplane again and giving pursuit, but Corley has come across a party of aeronauts about to make an ascent. He offers them $5,000 to lift him in thirty seconds. The aeronauts reply that it is impossible, as it will take another half hour to fix the basket. "Hitch on the horse instead," Corley cries, and the thing is done. Hayes, observing the ingenious escape, steers his aeroplane under the baloon and grasping the anchor ropes, swarms up to the living basket. A sharp struggle takes place between Hayes and Corley, and eventually both fall into a river below, from which they are rescued by the crew of a steamboat. The plan is discovered, and Hayes thus brings his third adventure to a happy and successful conclusion.

MIDGAR FEATURES.

THE DIAMONDS OF DESTINY: or A SCENTED CLUE (Imperator—Four Parts).—Fred Moore, notorious crook, bribes Jack Denham, a jeweler's clerk, to give information concerning the famous "Rajah" diamonds. He learns that the diamonds are to be despatched the following day. Moore forces his sister, Clara, to assist in the projected robbery and she goes to the jewelry store of Friedman & Co., where, in the guise of a customer, she asks Friedman to show her the diamonds. Although the diamonds are already packed for delivery, he shows them to her, and while his back is turned, Clara takes the measurements of the box. She returns to her home and her brother proceeds to make an exact duplicate of the box in which the diamonds are packed, but while this is being done, Clara's perfume is accidentally upset over the box. Through the assistance of the jeweler's clerk, Fred Moore and his sister are enabled to catch the same train which carries the special messenger sent by the jeweler to deliver the diamonds and by a clever ruse, they exchange boxes with the messenger.

The jeweler is notified by his customer that the box when received was empty and the jeweler seeks an interview with Detective Sharp. The detective and his assistant commence their investigations and while examining the jeweler's staff, the detective recognizes a former crook. This man is shadowed by the detective's assistant, who learns that the thieves are at a certain seaside town. The detective goes to the seashore and makes the acquaintance of a Countess Blenheim, who is none other than Clara Moore. Friendship ripens into love and the couple are much in each other's company. The detective is astounded upon discovering that the Countess uses a most peculiar perfume, traces of which he had already found on the duplicate jewel box and on a glove left in the jeweler's office after the visit of Clara Moore. The detective sends for the jeweler, who recognizes the Countess as the woman to whom he showed the diamonds, but the thieves receive a warning from their accomplice and they escape.

Detective Sharp traces the thieves to their headquarters, where he surprises the crooks. He is forced to hand over his revolver, but before doing so, extracts from it the cartridges. Fred Moore opens a trap door through which the detective is precipitated to a cell below. The detective extracts the powder from the cartridges and blows the lock from the door of the cell and escapes in time to cling to the back of the automobile in which the thieves are escaping. While speeding along a lonely road, Clara recognizes the man she loves in a perilous position on the rear of the automobile and at the point of a revolver, stops the car. Fred Moore escapes and takes to a fast motor boat.

After a hazardous and dangerous jump from a high bridge, the detective is picked up by a police patrol boat which starts in pursuit of Fred Moore. He is finally overtaken and at police headquarters the diamonds are found on him. Detective Sharp is complimented by the chief of police for his smart work, but he leaves headquarters with the knowledge that his duty is not yet fulfilled. He goes to the home of Clara Moore, and while his emotions are torn between love and duty, Clara points to a little green bottle on the table. With her last breath, she exhorts the unhappy man to remember that she died for the sake of the man she loved.

THE I. S. P. CO.

DETECTIVE FINN, OF SCOTLAND YARD 3 parts.—Lord Gray buys his wife an expensive diamond. They are seen making the purchase by a notorious London crook, who shadows them to their home. That night the crook and his accomplices, a man and a woman, capture Lady Gray's maid. They compel the maid to write a note to her ladyship, stating she has been taken suddenly ill, and that the bearer, her sister, will take her place. The woman crook takes the note to Lady Gray's residence, and is admitted into the household. She discovers Lady Gray locking the diamond in a small safe, after which she hides the key under a vase. During Lady Gray's absence the woman crook steals the jewel and conceals it by pinning it to her underskirt. A friend of the Grays calls at the house, and Lady Gray goes to show her the present. The loss of the valuable stone is discovered, and her husband is informed of the robbery. Lord Gray at once calls Detective Finn, of Scotland Yard, and places the case in his hands. The "maid" overhears Lord Gray's conversation, and learns the celebrated detective is expected within an hour. Calling her pals on the 'phone she tells them she has the diamond, but that the robbery has been discovered and Detective Finn put on the case.

The gentleman crook calls at Lord Gray's house. The card he presents bears the inscription "Detective Arthur Finn." He hears the story of the robbery. After numerous questions he asks if they have a maid, and the question being answered in the affirmative, he demands to see her She is summoned. By a secret code she tells her confederate where the stolen jewel is concealed. Informing his lordship that the maid is one of London's most noted crooks, he suddenly grabs her and wrests the diamond from her underskirt. He tells Lord and Lady Gray to leave the case entirely in his hands. With the maid supposedly under arrest, he leaves the house, taking the diamond with him, and telling Lord Gray if he calls at headquarters in the morning it will be returned to him.

Detective Finn leaves his office and makes his way to Lord Gray's. He enters the gate just as the two crooks come out. Entering the walk that leads to the house he finds a handkerchief, which has the odor of a peculiar perfume. When he presents his card to Lord Gray, he is told that Detective Finn had already been there. Convincing Lord Gray that he has been duped, he hears the whole story, and then starts in pursuit of the thieves, his only clue a perfumed handkerchief. About to board a bus he is again struck with the peculiar odor of the perfume on the handkerchief as a man and woman alight. He decides to "shadow" the pair. They discover they are being followed. The crook hurriedly puts his confederate into a taxi, telling her he will follow later and meet at their house. The crook then boards a bus, followed by the detective. In a hand-to-hand conflict on top of the bus, the crook knocks the detective down, and jumps onto a bus going in the opposite direction. The detective staggers up and succeeds in jumping onto the same bus, where another scuffle takes place, the detective again getting the worst of it, and the crook escapes by jumping onto a passing taxi. The detective hails a taxi and starts in pursuit. The detective overtakes the taxi, and makes a daring jump into it as it passes. Again the crook gets the better of a fight, and makes his escape by jumping onto a crane slowly rising in the air in front of a building which is being renovated, followed by the detective, who succeeds in grabbing a dangling chain. Finally they reach the scaffold, where a deadly struggle takes place; but again either by luck or superior strength, the crook makes his getaway over the roofs of the buildings, finally entering his own house, followed, however, by the detective. Here the detective is trapped, and bound securely to a sofa. A bomb is placed near the sofa, and a fuse, timed to burn for thirty minutes, is lighted, and attached to the bomb. Coolly informing the detective that half an hour later when the bomb explodes he will be on his way to Paris, the crook leaves, thoroughly convinced Detective Finn will bother him no more. But the crook reckons without the detective's dog. The dog becomes restless at his master's long absence. Escaping from the house, the canine trails his master to the house in which he is a captive, but finds difficulty in entering the room, as the window is only slightly open. After much maneuvering with the window the dog succeeds in forcing it upward, and gains entrance. Obeying its master it first upsets the bomb, putting out the fuse, and then gnaws at the cords which bind Finn, until he is able to get free. Rushing out of the house, Detective Finn hails a taxi, [illegible] and [illegible] to the Charing Cross Railway Station. He arrives just as the train pulls out, just too late to board the train that is taking the notorious crook to Dover. Hiring a high speed automobile, he tells the chauffeur he must beat the express to Dover. At breakneck speed, the automobile goes until it reaches the station at Dover—just ahead of the express. Making his way to the docks, the detective makes himself known to the officials, and assumes the disguise of a steward. At the gangplank he stands, waiting for the crook to come. Furtively glancing around him the crook approaches the gangplank, paying not the slightest attention to the disguised detective. As he approaches close to Finn a pair of handcuffs are snapped around his wrists, and he is marched off to jail to await his trial, not only for the robbery of the diamond, but on numerous other charges.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

CLOTHES.—Olive Sherwood, a pretty Western girl living in Omaha, is very fond of finery. Young and inexperienced, she knows nothing of the deeper currents of life, but the refinements of society and its polished exteriors appeals to her strongly, and the crude West does not seem to provide what her fastidious nature craves. Her loving old father sighs over her extravagances, but is too indulgent to curb them, and in order to gratify her expensive whims invests in some Red Star mining stock that West, a crafty, unscrupulous New York broker, induces him to buy. On a business trip to Omaha, West sees Olive, and casts an admiring and covetous eye upon her. Horace Watling, his wife, Anna, and their child, Ruth, are firm friends of Olive, and Mrs. Watling's love for clothes creates a strong bond between both women. Mr. Watling, who is a small publisher, is induced to come to New York and establish himself there as a partner in a big publishing concern. Olive envies the Watlings' gay life in the metropolis, so that when her father dies and West advises her to come to New York, Olive is easily persuaded to do so. For a time Olive is delighted with the gaiety of metropolitan society, but she has only one "party gown," and its frequent appearances soon cause sly amusement and concealed scorn. Olive, left in straitened circumstances by her father's death, grieves over her lack of money for pretty clothes. At this juncture West comes forward and tells her that the Red Star mining stock owned by her father has boomed, giving her money in the form of "dividends." Olive innocently accepts the funds, unaware that the stock is worthless. A young clerk in West's office, whose father had been ruined by the broker, watches West's dealings closely, and enters in a diary all the evidence of West's crimes, hoping thereby to finally convict him. Watling, though prosperous, is weighed down by business cares, has little use for the society his wife worships, and secretly longs for the simplicity and happiness of his former life; and little Ruth, who is the devoted friend of Olive, is sadly neglected by her ambitious mother. Mrs. Watling invites Olive to a society circus. Olive has already met her ideal, Richard Burbank, a rich young society man who is weary of the sham and artificiality of the life about him, and who has fallen ardently in love with Olive. He, too, attends the house party, and there declares his love for Olive. Olive accepts him and is very happy. West, who observes a tender scene between the two, is furious with jealousy, and enters Olive's room in a drunken frenzy, telling her that she will be his or he will expose her. Olive stares at him in mingled bewilderment and fright, when another guest suddenly enters the room. West hastily leaves, but later, in the presence of all the guests, and amid the gaieties of the society circus, West denounces Olive, and dramatically tells the assemblage that he has been supporting her, and that she would sell her soul for clothes. In proof of this, he displays the receipt for the clothes she wears, for which he had advanced the money in the guise of dividends. Olive, shamed by the disgrace into which her innocent ignorance and love of finery has led her, is too overwhelmed and humiliated to speak, and Burbank is reluctantly forced, in a bitter moment of doubt, to believe her silent admission of West's claims. During this episode, Watling learns that the Red Star mining stock, in which he had heavily invested on the advice of Olive, is worthless. Mrs. Watling also turns against Olive, who, broken-hearted, returns to Omaha, glad to do the sewing for the neighbors she once despised. When it is learned that the Watlings have lost their fortune, they are shunned, and they too see the hollowness and mockery of society, and decide to return to Omaha and begin life anew. Burbank cannot forget Olive, and with returning love comes the conviction that she is innocent. He goes to West's office, determined to learn where she is, just as West is contemplating a trip abroad on his ill-gotten gains. West tries to escape, but the vengeful clerk aids Burbank in detaining him. The clerk produces the evidence of West's villainies, and the rogue, confronted by exposure and disgrace, and weakened by worry and dissipation, falls dead of heart failure. Little Ruth sees Olive in Omaha, and at once writes Burbank of her presence there. Burbank goes to Omaha, and the lovers are happily reunited. And Olive at last realizes the value of love and the folly of pride in clothes.

A BURIED SECRET (Three Parts).—The young detective, Jack, was successful in his profession; but there was one thing needed to complete his happiness and that was the hand of the girl he loved. Fortune favored him in his suit. Juanna returned his affection and the lovers appeared to be on a fair way to a life of peace and sympathetic companionship. Trouble, however, came from an unexpected quarter. Juanna's mother was a woman of fashion who led a double life. At home she was all that a mother should be. Abroad she was a determined devotee of pleasure, associating with the wealthy and fashionable. At a well-known resort she made the acquaintance of a great financier, in whose handsome salons she was always an honored guest.

The financier's house was entered one night by burglars and all the valuables stolen. The task of tracking down the criminals fell to the young detective, Jack, who, armed with a clue, succeeded in running them to earth in a secret cave where they were accustomed to meet and divide the spoils. And here a horrible discovery awaited the young man. This was nothing more nor less than the staggering fact that the mother of the girl he was in love with was the chief of the band of burglars. To think that this handsome refined woman who moved in the best circles was guilty of such depraved conduct was a great blow to the young detective.

Nevertheless he resolved to do his duty. He confronted the woman in her house. She was amazed. She denied his accusation. He threatened her at pistol's point. But she outwitted him. Touching a concealed bell push, men servants entered the room and bound and secured the young detective while the woman wrested the revolver from his grasp. The fate of the young detective was horrible in the extreme. He was flung, bound and gagged into a subterranean stream from which after truly Herculean efforts he managed to escape, floating out into the open river and being rescued more dead than alive.

His escape is the signal for the guilty woman to take alarm. She realizes now that her arrest and condemnation to prison life are certain. Frightened beyond description she takes to flight. She makes her way to a steamer setting out for a foreign port. But the young detective is in hot pursuit. He boards the ship and unmasks the woman. Determined to escape, the guilty woman leaps into the sea and is drowned. The young detective returns to the girl he loves and she in losing an erring mother finds a husband who will console her for her loss.

A SHATTERED IDOL (Three Parts).—Dr. Gardel is a man of peculiar ideas. His charity work has endeared him to the poor of the city, and their sufferings have preyed upon his mind to such an extent that he becomes a daring thief, taking from the rich to give to the destitute. Lydia Strand, the daughter of a wealthy banker, is present at a discussion of the recent robberies, and comment is made upon the coincidence that donations are made to charitable institutions by an anonymous person following each burglary. Lydia expresses her admiration of the clever thief, and takes delight in reading of his exploits. One night Gardel effects an entrance into the banker's home and is surprised by Lydia. He tells her of his ideas, though he refuses to reveal his face, which is hidden by a black handkerchief. He is fascinated by the charming girl, and as he leaves he grasps her in his strong arms and presses a kiss upon her lips.

Gardel pays court to Lydia, and finally secures her parents' consent to wed her. She does not suspect that he was the burglar she entertained, and being of a highly romantic temperament she dreams of the man she has enshrined in her heart as a hero. Much against her own inclination she is persuaded to marry Gardel. She does not prove an affectionate wife, and Gardel is worried. Her parents go abroad, and the big house is unoccupied. She resolves to revisit the room where she conversed with the robber in the dead of the night. Gardel, starting on one of his marauding expeditions, sees her and follows. She sits down, and in a spirit of make-believe addresses a letter to her unknown hero, reading aloud as she writes. The doctor, listening, believes she is writing to a real lover, and with an agonized cry leaps from the high balcony to the court below. Lydia runs down and tears the covering from the dead man's face, and finds the unknown idol she has been worshipping is her own husband

CONVICT 113 (Three Parts).—Revillat is ruined by unwise speculations, and goes through bankruptcy. His creditors bring criminal action against him and he is sentenced to prison. After several years he is treated as a "trusty," and when John Lange, a wealthy planter, asks the prison officials for a secretary, Revillat is given the position. His gentlemanly deportment and ability win him the regard of Lange, who is a bachelor with no living relatives.

One night a terrible fire breaks out in Lange's residence. The firemen fight the blaze, but it

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

spreads fiercely. Lange, in his bedroom on the top floor, is overcome. Revillat dashes into the inferno and tries to carry Lange out. The planter realizes that he is dying and begs Revillat to save himself. "Change clothes with me quick and leave me. You will be able to escape—a free man." Revillat does so, but before he can get out the floors crash down and he is buried in the debris. When extricated he is horribly scarred. The body of Lange is found in the ruins and is identified as Revillat on account of the shreds of the convict suit clinging to him, and Revillat comes out of the hospital many weeks later and takes his place as Lange.

In the meantime Revillat's daughter has grown up and is engaged to be married. He arranges to meet his wife and child, but dares not reveal his identity. One day he tenderly kisses his daughter, and her fiance, fired with jealousy, breaks the engagement. Revillat goes to him, and in a dramatic scene assures the young man that he entertains only a fatherly feeling for the girl, and effects a reconciliation. Then, realizing that if his identity should be revealed it would bring sorrow and fear to his wife, who is mourning him as dead, he secretly arranges to pay off all his old debts and has his estate settled upon his wife, and departs into the world—alone.

MEPHISTOPHELIA (Three Parts).—A crime of extraordinary daring has at last set the police on the track of the notorious Martin Fierro. At bay, the bandits make a brave resistance, but they are overcome, and Fierro himself is struck down not, however, before consigning his little daughter to safety by means of a secret passage. Orphaned and unprotected, the little child is found and adopted by the philanthropist, Lord Felton, justly known as the "Father of the London Poor." Discovering his protegee's parentage, the good man shows the world how change of circumstances and environment may overcome even the power of heredity.

Many years pass. The adopted girl, now Lady Felton, has inherited her self-appointed guardian's fortune on his death. She lives a life of luxury, and spends large sums for the benefit of the poor. Meanwhile a series of robberies have aroused the curiosity of London. At the scene of each crime is found a visiting card of the name, "Satanella," bearing a coronet and the motto, "To rob the unjust rich. . . . To give to the poor."

Satanella, who is none other than Lady Felton, resolves to give up her unusual form of charity, finding discovery imminent, but is persuaded to run the risk of detection once more by the sad story of a woman who has fallen into the usurious clutches of a banker named Jacob.

A masked ball is held at Lady Felton's mansion, and Jacob is among the guests. During the festivities Satanella enters the banker's study, and, though the money she requires is missing, seizes a document severely compromising Jacob in his relations with the nation. The banker returns from the ball, and finds the usual card in the place of the stolen document, bearing the message that she will come back at midnight for the money she requires, or will betray him to the police. Jacob forms a plot to assassinate her, and forces her lover—Lord Humphrey—whom he had once helped in a time of ill luck, and had since retained in his debt and power, to comply with his intention.

Satanella, however, who has heard their plans in hiding, is ready for them when she arrives. She cleverly seizes the money, and hides her escape in the smoke of a small bomb. Determined to save Humphrey, Satanella forces Jacob to relinquish her lover's I. O. U. in exchange for his own incriminating document, but the banker is able to identify her with Lady Felton. The police arrive to arrest her, but the philanthropic criminal boldly accuses Jacob of treachery to his country, and, during the confusion caused by his attempt to escape, disappears by a secret door in a picture frame. Hopeless attempts are made to follow her, but the impenetrable veil of mystery has closed upon Satanella.

THE TRIUMPH OF AN EMPEROR (Savoia—Five Parts).—Emperor Maximian, having married his daughter, Fausta, to Constantine, renounced the purple and went into retirement, but the enforced idleness and his desire for power and action, induced him to again resume the imperial power. In the field near Lodi, where the oath of allegiance of the army has been received, Maximian begins his triumphant return, and we see him again amid the people crowding the streets, impatient to see him again. He enters the imperial court where Constance, a sister of Constantine, and Licinius, the young Caesar of Illyrium, and Fausta are waiting the arrival of their august relation. The love affair between Constance and Licinius is discovered by Fausta, who has instructions to prevent this alliance from being consummated, as Maximian himself has set his heart on winning Constance. As soon as he enters the palace, and the tumult of greetings cease, he goes into the ladies' room and, dismissing Fausta with a sign, is left alone with Constance, whom he tries to win through flattery; but she refuses him. She goes secretly to St. Maternus and listens to his inspiring words, receiving the right of Christian baptism from his hands. Fausta, having followed Constance, sees all and hastens to tell her father of her discovery. Maximian orders a banquet in the hope that the allurements of pleasure will break down the stubborn defense of Constance. Even this fails, for Constance does not even go near the banquetting room. Maximian then calls together the pagan priests; he annuls his decree, giving tolerance to Christianity. Thousands of confessors of Christ will fall. Constance alone, by giving herself up, will be able to appease the bloody sword of the persecutor. He forces the young neophyte, Constance, to be present at the gladiatorial games. A populace present at the games at the hecatomb of martyrs. The heart of the young Christian girl undergoes a terrible martyrdom, but the bravery of these martyrs gives the girl the firmness that only faith can produce. Maximian, again failing in his attempt to win Constance, tries again, and goes to the field of Lodi and, summoning the army, he orders incense to be thrown upon the pagan tripod. Here again Christian heroes give up their lives to their faith, their bodies are carried in chariots before the imperial seat, before the eyes of Fausta and Constance. Realizing that there is no peace in the court of Maximian for her, she, with her companions, mount their horses and rush to the Court of Constantine. Here exists no bacchanalian orgy, but the sweet calm of virtue. Constantine, amid the lowly, the oppressed and the poor, does his work of upright government. Constance tells her powerful brother all of the horrible plots in which she has been involved and the terrors she has seen. In the meantime, Maximian and Fausta plot the death of Constantine and send the corrupt centurian, Elvius Brutus, to execute the treasonable deed. Through a trick, this design is frustrated, but Brutus is led to believe that his work has been carried out and he tells Maximian, who comes before the gallis coharts, exclaiming: "Constantine is dead! I am your emperor!" "Constantine is living!" interrupts a powerful voice, and the austere monarch appears among a crowd of faithful followers. Maximian is put to death and Fausta, fearing the penalty for her part in the plot, rushes word to her brother, Maxentius, in Rome, who declared war on Constantine. Gathering his coharts together, Constantine crosses the snowy Alps and carries the war into Italy. As day is declining, Constantine, unable to rest, paces to and fro between the tents when, at last, his eyes catch sight of something dazzling in the direction of the sun. He sees a splendid cross in the blue heaven in all its glory, with the inscription: "In Hoc Signo Vincis," but the Emperor, not comprehending the meaning of this sign, was further instructed in the clear night where a vision of the Lord Himself appeared, telling him: "By this sign you will conquer," and directing him to engrave the Holy Cross on his shields. The army resumes its march toward Rome, exulting at the miracle. Meeting the army of Maxentius on the Banks of the Tiber, the battle wages fiercely for hours, but eventually, the followers of Maxentius are put to route and retreat across the Tiber on bridges made of boats, which give way, carrying Maxentius and his men to their death. Having made his triumphal entry into Rome, the first thought of Constantine is to pay homage to the chief of Christianity, Pontifex St. Melchiades; he prostrates himself at his feet, together with the dutiful Constance and promises to give Christianity free liberty and, as a token of filial reverence, gives the magnificent palace of the Lateran, to be the mother church of all the churches of the world. We see Constantine in his triumphant dress in the same imperial hall where the last bloody persecution had begun. Licinius hastens to Milan to joint his beloved Constance, and has signed the decree giving full liberty to Christianity. He is flanked by a victorious host and looks at the people crowded and acclaiming while the herald reads the imperial message:

"We, Constantine and Licinius Augustus, being at Milan to make joint treaties concerning the welfare and security of our people amongst the things which we deem enhancing the prosperity of our subjects, we specially give importance to those that have reference to the homage due to the Divinity and thus we have given to the Christians and to all citizens of the Roman people the liberty to follow the form of faith which each one may severally prefer."

The forum is deserted, the darkness of night prevails and Constantine is alone in his Hall lighted up by the soft rays falling from a lamp; he holds in his hands a little tablet containing the decree and is meditating. A few lines contain the history of the world. He closes his eyes and before his mind appears in review the facts which led Christianity to victory after so many centuries of bloodshed. Footsteps awaken the Emperor. Constance and Licinius, with their arms interlocked, enter. Constantine sees and smiles. In the triumph of faith and justice, innocent love also has its victory.

"THE GAUMONT COMPANY ANNOUNCES AND DENOUNCES"

Pursuant to its warning in last week's Moving Picture World, that the criminal referred to is still pursuing his evil practices. So skillful is his work that the police are helpless because he is lionized by his victims and the public. He is followed by throngs on Broadway wherever he appears. Two weeks ago the management of the New York Theatre thought they had the goods on him as he appeared and operated there where all could see him, but the crowds that invaded the theatre were so dense that he made his usual get-a-way. He boldly announces that to-day, the 7th of March, he will commence a new series of crimes more startling and sensational than ever before and defies capture. Theatre managers are especially interested. Those who detain him for even a short while will receive large rewards at the box office. We warned him that we would expose him. His name is Fantomas the Crook Detective. Act quick and acquire the State Rights or rental.

VICTOR WATSON

The affair was a genuine eye-opener. The Anglo-American Film Corporation startled Broadway with the scope of its presentation. The man who walks up to the box office and hands over a small coin to see "THE THREE MUSKETEERS" will be getting his money's worth many times over. Any family that has in it young folk who are at school today will fail of an absolute duty if the youngsters are not taken to see this masterpiece of the moving picture art.

NEW YORK PRESS

With the entry into the local field of "THE THREE MUSKETEERS" American producers feel once more the keen competition of the European producers. European productions provide new thrills for film patrons.

EVENING TELEGRAM

The first presentation of a notable production of Alexander Dumas' romance, "THE THREE MUSKETEERS."

NEW YORK REVIEW

Dumas' masterpiece is one of the finest pictures ever shown in this country and marks a new era in the presentation of subjects that appeal to the intellect at popular prices.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE

One of the largest crowds ever in the theatre witnessing the premier. The picture is well done, showing the subject in every detail.

EVENING SUN

Thrilled a packed house—detail of the historical atmosphere that permeates the story was brought out with care.

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

The scene of a triumph of photographic art which has scarcely had an equal in its day of film triumphs was presented before an enthusiastic and fashionable audience. The picture was as nearly perfect as art could make it. Nothing was neglected.

THE GLOBE

"THREE MUSKETEERS," gorgeous film play. This production is now being presented at the New York Theatre and not a man, woman or child in New York City should fail to witness this picture, which is one of the best ever staged for the screen.

NEW YORK HERALD

Film d'Art production of "THREE MUSKETEERS" was exhibited for the first time in America before a crowded house at the New York Theatre. The film was smooth and free from eye-tiring imperfections.

JOHN JOY EDSON, Treasurer — GEORGE W. HUTCHISON, Assistant Secretary

Mr. Henry R. Howland,
Buffalo Society of Natural Sciences,
Buffalo, New York.

My Dear Mr. Howland:-

Your letter of February 9 has been referred to me in the absence of Mr. Austin.

Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt addressed the National Geographic Society several weeks ago. Our large attendance necessitated two lectures--one in the afternoon and the other in the evening of the same day.

Captain Kleinschmidt's motion pictures and slides of the Arctic are simply wonderful and are comparable to the Rainey African pictures. Your audience will be amazed at the amount of animated natural history which his films show. His motion pictures of walrus herds, numbering hundreds, beggars description.

Yours very sincerely,
(Signed) John O. LaGorce,
Assistant Editor.

Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt's Arctic Hunt

Eighteen Thousand Feet Condensed Into Six Thousand

Picturesque life of the Eskimo, thrilling scenes of fights with Sea Lions, Walrus sporting on the ice floes, Sulphur Bottom Whales, giant Moose and Caribou in their native fastnesses. Polar Bear and the great Kodiak Bear within a few feet of the camera. The largest glacier in the world casting off icebergs the size of a twenty-story building, and volcanos spouting out of the sea, are some of the sublime scenes from Nature's own studio. Contains Educational features of unusual and exceptional value, at the same time is highly amusing and entertaining to every class of audience throughout the world.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

THE Phantoscope stands for quality and satisfaction. If you are in doubt about it, send for letters of endorsement from those who are using it.

The Phantoscope projects a brilliant eight-foot picture with current taken from an ordinary incandescent lamp socket in office or home.

The Phantoscope is absolutely safe; it will not ignite the film no matter how long the light may be left shining thereon. It is portable, weighing but 18 lbs.

We are selling these machines right along to others who are finding them satisfactory. Why don't we have YOUR order. We are certainly willing. Send us a small deposit, say, ten dollars, and we will ship the Phantoscope C.O.D., privilege of examination.

The Phantoscope, complete in traveling case, $100.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.
